This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

THE JURIST.

LONDON, JANUARY 17, 1857.

FEW subjects have given rise to more discussions than the question, how far Courts of equity will enforce a voluntary trust. The principle, indeed, upon which the Courts proceed has been clearly laid down, viz. that where a trust has been actually created, and the relation of trustee and cestui que trust established, it will be enforced in favour of volunteers; but that where there is a mere agreement, or an imperfect conveyance or assignment in favour of volunteers, equity remains quiescent, and will not, by creating a trust, or establishing the relation of trustee and cestui que trust, interfere in the absence of consideration.

The application, however, of this principle has been attended with some difficulty, and the cases are many of them not very easily reconcileable with each other. A recent case before the Lord Chancellor is deserving of notice, because, although it appears to be decided in accordance with the principles upon which the Court has always professed to act, some of the propositions laid down by his Lordship seem altogether to depart from them, and are directly adverse to decisions which hitherto have been considered as binding authorities. The case before alluded to is that of Scales v. Maude, (6 De G., Mac., & G. 43; 1 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1147). There the mortgagee of property wrote letters to the mortgagor and persons interested under him, containing the following expressions:—"I now give this gift to become due at my death, unconnected with my will. . . . . I hereby request my executors to cancel the mortgage deed. . . . . I again direct that my executors shall comply with my former request—that is, to cancel all deeds and papers I may have chargeable on the Rycroft estate." It was held by the Lord Chancellor that no effect could be given to such expressions. "In order," said his Lordship, "to sustain the case of the defendants, they must make out that this is a valid declaration of trust. But I do not think it is a declaration of trust at all, for it was intended merely to be a direction to the executors. The mortgagee speaks of a gift; there is, in fact, no gift, except in the direction to the executors. It was obviously revocable. . . . . Mere declaration of trust by the owner of property in favour of a volunteer is inoperative, and this Court will not interfere in such a case. The case is different where there has been a change of legal ownership, and so a trust has been constituted, and then the Court will inquire what the trusts are."

The Lord Chancellor, therefore, appears to be of opinion that a person having property can only create a trust in favour of a volunteer by a transfer of the legal interest therein. But is this correct? According to the admitted principle upon which the Court acts, where a trust has actually been created, and the relation of trustee and cestui que trust established, equity will enforce the trust in favour of volunteers; but if a person declares himself to be a trustee for another, a trust is actually created, and the relation of trustee and cestui que trust is as completely established as if there had been an actual transfer of the legal ownership; and a Court of equity, therefore, has sufficient grounds for carrying the trusts into effect.

For authority upon this subject, we have only to turn to the well-known case of Ex parte Pye—Ex parte Dubost, (18 Ves. 14), where there was no transfer of the legal ownership from the donor of certain French annuities; but his Lordship decided in favour of the donee, because the donor had committed to writing what seemed a sufficient declaration that he held that part of the estate in trust for the donee. "It is clear," said Lord Eldon in that case, "that a Court of equity will not assist a volunteer; yet, if the act is completed, though voluntary, the Court will act upon it. It has been decided, that upon an agreement to transfer stock, this Court will not interpose; but if the party had declared himself to be the trustee of that stock, it becomes the property of the cestui que trust, without more, and the Court will act upon it." We may also refer to Wheatley v. Purr, (1 Kee. 551); M'Fadden v. Jenkyns, (1 Ph. 153); Frampton v. Frampton, (4 Beav. 287); James v. Bydder, (Id. 605); Thorpe v. Owen, (5 Beav. 224); and Stapleton v. Stapleton, (14 Sim. 186), as authorities clearly bearing out the propositions laid down by Lord Eldon upon this subject. It is true, that where a person ineffectually attempts, by an imperfect gift, to confer an interest upon volunteers or trustees for their benefit, a Court of equity, however clear the intention may appear to have been to confer an interest upon the donees, will not interfere; and in this respect the decision of the Lord Chancellor in Scales v. Maude appears to be right.

The distinction between an imperfect gift and a declaration of trust, the legal ownership remaining unchanged, has been clearly recognised by Lord Cottenham in Edwards v. Jones, (1 My. & C. 237), where he adopted the views upon this subject of another very eminent equity judge—Sir William Grant. In that case, in which it was held that as a gift was incomplete the Court could not give effect to it, Lord Cottenham (admitting that if a trust had been declared the Court would have given effect to it) made the following observations:—"The general doctrine laid down by Sir William Grant is extremely applicable here. In order to bring this transaction within the rule, that if there be a trust created, and the relation of trustee and cestui que trust once constituted, the Court will execute the intention, it was argued here that the defendant became a trustee for the donee. The same argument was used in the case of Antrobus v. Smith, and it was met by Sir William Grant with this observation—'Mr. Crawford was not otherwise a trustee than as any man may be called so who professes to give property by an instrument incapable of conveying it. He was not in form declared a trustee; nor was that mode of doing what he proposed in his contemplation. He meant a gift. He says he assigns the property; but it was a gift not complete. The property was not transferred by the act. Could he himself have been compelled to give effect to the gift by making an assignment? There is no case in which a party has been compelled to perfect a gift, which, in the mode of making it, he has left imperfect. There is a locus penitentiæ as long as it is incomplete.' Every word of that judgment applies directly to the circumstances of the present case. It is impossible, indeed, to distinguish the two cases; and it is equally impossible to question the doctrine there laid down." (See also Dillon v. Coppin, 4 My. & C. 647; Searle v. Law, 15 Sim. 95). The distinction, therefore, between this class of cases and those where the settlor constitutes himself a trustee for volunteers, whatever foundation it may have in reason or common sense, is clearly marked, and has been long acted upon; and it would be a matter for regret if a subject already sufficiently difficult, and embarrassed with nice and not very easily defined or substantial distinctions, should be further entangled by contradictory propositions, emanating from the highest court, rendering it difficult, if not impossible, for counsel to advise with any certainty in such matters, and for inferior Courts how to act.

Suppose, in the case of Scales v. Maude, the mortgagee had written to A., the mortgagor, saying, "I hold the mortgaged estate called B., and the sum of 2500*l.* charged thereon by way of mortgage, in trust for you, A." Now, although the legal ownership both in the estate and debt would remain unchanged in the mortgagee, according to the doctrine and decision of Lord Eldon in Ex parte Pye—Ex parte Dubost, followed, as we have seen, by the decisions of many other eminent judges, the mortgagee would be held to have constituted himself a trustee for A.; and unless the doctrine promulgated by the Lord Chancellor prevail, such trust would be enforced in favour of A., though a volunteer. According to the Lord Chancellor, as no change of the legal ownership had taken place, and there being a mere declaration of trust by the owner of the property, viz. the mortgagee, in favour of a volunteer, it would be inoperative, and the Court could not interfere.

The principle, however, upon which the Court has always professed to act, and the current of authorities, seem to be clearly against the doctrine of the Lord Chancellor; nor does it seem probable that it will prevail against the decisions, and clearly expressed opinions, of so many other equity judges.

The judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in the well-known cause of Swinfen v. Swinfen can hardly be said to decide the nature and extent of counsel's authority to compromise a case intrusted to his care. Crowder, J., was of opinion that in the case before the Court there was no sufficient evidence of a special authority for the compromise, and also that from the relation of counsel and client no general authority for that purpose could be implied. Cresswell and Williams, JJ., who were the only other members of the Court, differed from their learned brother, but whether on the ground of a special authority appearing, or a general authority existing, or on both of these grounds, does not appear. The three learned judges, however, concurred in thinking that under the circumstances no attachment ought to go against Mrs. Swinfen, and in severely reprobating the conduct of one of her counsel for his violent and unjustifiable attacks upon Sir Frederick Thesiger. "It is the unanimous opinion of the Court," said Crowder, J., "that Sir Frederick Thesiger's honour remains entirely unsullied in this transaction"—an opinion which we are sure will be held by all unprejudiced persons who take the trouble of investigating the facts of the case. There is no member of the Bar who is more deservedly respected and beloved than Sir Frederick Thesiger. The courtesy, and at the same time the dignity of his demeanour, his kindness to all around him, and the high principles of honour by which his conduct has ever been marked, are appreciated by that Profession which he adorns by his eloquence and his abilities.

The following observations by Crowder, J., upon the general question involved in the case, will be of interest to our readers:—

"It is contended, that without any special authority previously given, or any subsequent ratification, Sir F. Thesiger, by the mere relationship of counsel to his client, was invested with a general agency, and with authority to bind her by any agreement he might in his discretion enter into on her behalf while conducting the cause in court. It was assimilated in argument to the case of partners in trade, where a general agency, arising from their relation as partners, makes the acceptance of a bill of exchange by one binding upon the other in favour of third parties, although in the particular instance the authority may have been expressly revoked; and it was further insisted, that even if Mrs. Swinfen had come into court during the negotiation, and expressly prohibited Sir F. Thesiger from proceeding, yet unless she gave notice of her prohibition to the opposite party she would have been bound by her counsel's signature to that agreement. This introduces a question of very general and grave importance, far beyond the particular merits of the present case. Is counsel in the position of an agent clothed with any such general authority to bind his client? I must own, that in the course of a somewhat long professional experience at the bar, I was never aware of the existence of such an extensive agency, and was therefore much astonished at the proposition so broadly laid down by the counsel for the defendant in the course of the argument. We were not referred to any text-book, ancient or modern, in support of such a principle, nor to any positive decision in which such a doctrine has been established. It is said that business could not be conducted in courts of justice if counsel were not to trust each other as the authorised agents of their clients, and if the Court were not to place implicit reliance on their acts. This is quite true with respect to all acts or admissions of counsel in the ordinary course of the conduct of a cause. He professes, in conducting a cause, to act entirely on his own judgment and discretion, uncontrolled by his client, and the client leaves the whole management of the cause to the counsel. But where a compromise is contemplated, and litigation is to cease upon terms to be arranged, counsel then can only act, as I believe, under special instructions. Undoubtedly, by the courtesy of the Bar, counsel in all cases repose entire confidence in each other as the authorised agents of their clients. Where, therefore, opposing counsel confer together with a view to a settlement of a cause, each is supposed to act from his own client's express special authority, and each believes his opponent to be so acting. But I am not aware that any counsel engaged in making terms ever supposed for a moment that his opponent had power to bind his client without express instructions. Each acts upon the assumption that his adversary has his client's special authority to enter into the arrangement, which otherwise could not be concluded; and the judge also presumes the special authority given when he sanctions the drawing up of an order of Nisi Prius embodying the terms of the arrangement. If, therefore, in any such cases, a counsel, under a misapprehension of his client's instructions, and believing himself to have authority, acts in fact without it, he cannot, in my opinion, bind his client. When a litigant party in a cause intrusts his brief to a counsel, his object is to have the benefit of his advocacy, and not to employ an agent to negotiate terms of compromise. Taking the general rule of law laid down in Smith's Mercantile Law, 134, to be correct—namely, that the extent of the agent's authority is, as between his principal and third parties, to be measured by the extent of his usual employment—can it be said that it is part of counsel's usual employment not only to plead the cause of his client in court, but to negotiate for the division of the property in dispute between the litigant parties? A client might think a particular barrister an excellent advocate, and therefore employ him, but might have no confidence in his power as a negotiator of terms of compromise; and, taking the present case as an example, it would seem a strong thing to hold that counsel receiving a brief from a plaintiff in a feigned issue out of Chancery, to try whether there was a valid devise of a large estate to her, has incidentally an implied authority to decide that his client shall agree to waive the question, and give up all claim to the estate, upon receiving a certain annuity for life. We have been much pressed, in the course of the arguments, with the serious consequences which may result to the opposite party from such engagements being avoided; but these are precisely such as may result in every case from the acts of unauthorised agents, for the principal is never bound where the agent acts beyond the scope of his authority. Nor do I perceive the necessity of investing counsel with any such extensive agency; for where a client wishes to give his counsel a discretionary power to compromise a cause, it is very easy to do so by special instructions; and if the client gives no special instructions, it may fairly be assumed that he intends to give no power to compromise; but if the law should be laid down, that counsel, without special instructions, have such a power vested in them, it will be necessary, in every case in which the client is determined to try his cause out, not only to give special instructions to his counsel to make no compromise, but also to notify to the opposite party that he has so done, or else to be personally present at the trial, in order to be ready, at a moment's notice, to withdraw his brief from counsel, and thus revoke his authority. This would surely be attended with much inconvenience, and would be alike disagreeable to counsel and client. The case of Filmer v. Delber (3 Taunt. 486) has been referred to, in which it was held that the attorney had power to bind his client by an order of reference of Nisi Prius without his consent, and even against his instructions. But the Court there said that the client has a remedy against his attorney for any injury resulting from his acting without authority. Lord Tenterden, however, in Biddell v. Dowse, (6 B. & Cr. 255), where the question was, whether infants could be bound by the attorney agreeing to refer, seems to have carefully abstained from expressing any acquiescence in the decision of Filmer v. Delber, for he says —'Admitting, for the sake of argument, but no further, that the consent of the attornies of such of the parties in the suit as were adult might be binding upon them,' &c.; then deciding that the infants, at all events, were not bound. Attornies are responsible to their clients for negligence or unskilfulness; but no action lies against the counsel for his acts, if done bonâ fide for his client. In this respect, therefore, the counsel stands in a different position from the attorney, and it is every day's experience at Nisi Prius for counsel, when pressed by the judge to refer a cause, to inform the Court, that in the absence of any instructions, he had no power to agree to a reference; and my firm conviction always was, and still is, that counsel is not justified in referring a cause against the client's consent, and that it is not within the scope of his authority. It has been thought by the Legislature convenient for the due administration of justice that the presiding judge should have the power in certain cases to compel a reference of the whole or part of a cause; but before the passing of the Common-law Procedure Act, 1854, I apprehend no judge had power to insist upon a reference, and no counsel, without the consent of his client, had power to agree to one. The cases mainly relied upon as establishing the extensive general agency of counsel were, Mole v. Smith, (1 J. & W. 665); In re Hobler, (8 Beav. 101); Hargrave v. Hargrave, (12 Beav. 408); and Furnival v. Bogle, (4 Russ. 142). Of these, Hargrave v. Hargrave most resembles in its circumstances the present case. A feigned issue had been there directed by the Court of Chancery to try the legitimacy of the plaintiff, and at the trial a juror was withdrawn, upon an agreement entered into by counsel on both sides, without the instructions of their clients, for the division of the estate between the litigant parties. This agreement could not have been enforced in Chancery if the fullest authority had been given, because of the plaintiff's infancy, and the consequent want of reciprocity. The petition to the Master of the Rolls by the plaintiff only prayed that the defendant should elect whether he would abide by the agreement, and if not, that he should pay the plaintiff's costs thrown away upon the abortive trial. There is certainly some language of Lord Langdale in that case extremely strong to support the view of counsel's implied authority to bind his client, with respect to third parties, by such an agreement. But the decision against the defendant proceeded mainly on the ground that the defendant actually consented to the agreement at one time after it was made, though subsequently he determined to repudiate it; for Lord Langdale says—'From the affidavits, I cannot doubt, that beyond the general authority which the defendant's counsel had, there was, either previously or subsequently, an adoption or consent to the terms by the defendant. It is expressly stated, and not denied by the defendant, that he did at one time consent to the terms, and that he afterwards refused to be bound by them;' and the agreement was set aside, and a new trial granted upon the terms of the defendant paying all costs. Had Lord Langdale been quite satisfied that the general implied authority of counsel was sufficient of itself to bind the defendant it would have been needless to refer to his consent, which in that view was quite immaterial. The other cases seem to fall within the ordinary scope of counsel's authority at the Chancery bar, where parties to the suit are obliged to give their consent to many important matters through their counsel in open court. Thus, in Mole v. Smith, counsel consented to his client accepting in lieu of dower what the Court might think her entitled to out of certain purchase money; and Lord Eldon there said—'It is for Mr. Shadwell to consider whether he is authorised to give his consent for the widow. If he does, I must act upon it, and she will be bound by it.' And so in Re Hobler, (8 Beav. 101), where, on petition to tax a solicitor's bill without costs, by consent of the petitioner's counsel, a fresh counsel on a subsequent day applied to rescind the order, on the ground that his client had not authorised his former counsel's consent to the dismissal. Lord Langdale there said—'The business of the Court cannot proceed unless credit is given to the statements of counsel that they have authority for what they do. They must themselves judge of the extent of their authority under the ordinary responsibility. The petition must be dismissed, with costs.' The consent to the dismissal of such a petition was in the ordinary course of the practice of the Court, and unless counsel's word were to be taken as conclusive in such matters, it would be impossible that the ordinary business of the Court could proceed. But these cases seem to me to have no very strong bearing upon that now under consideration. In Furnival v. Bogle, where an agreement had been made by counsel without the plaintiff's authority, that the defendant should take money out of court, the decision was in favour of the plaintiff, and the agreement was annulled. The ground of the decision certainly was, that the counsel for the plaintiff had acted without a knowledge of all the facts essential to enable him to exercise a sound discretion for his client. This case, therefore, would seem to be no authority in favour of the defendant. The fact not known to the counsel in Furnival v. Bogle was, that the client had before rejected the very same proposition to which the counsel had agreed; and Lord Lyndhurst, adverting to that circumstance, said—'If Mr. Furnival had been in court when Mr. Sugden made his proposition, I have no doubt he would have prevented the arrangement from being acceded to; and if the circumstances to which I have referred had been communicated to his counsel, they would not have assented to the order; for it is quite impossible that they should have considered themselves justified in acceding, in the absence of Mr. Furnival and his solicitor, to the proposal of Messrs. Bogle, had they been aware that a similar offer had been before made to him and rejected; that upon its being renewed he returned no answer, which amounted to a second rejection; and that he had desired the utmost activity to be used in order to prevent the money being taken out of court.' Now, it appears in the present case that the plaintiff, before the commencement of the litigation, had rejected an offer much more advantageous in its terms than those contained in the agreement in question, and that she had refused again to entertain the proposition when recommended to her by Sir F. Thesiger, after the adjournment of the cause on Saturday. It appears further, however, from Mr. Simpson's affidavit, that he had communicated to counsel the fact of his client's rejection of the former offer. In this respect, therefore, the present case differs from Furnival v. Bogle. But I think it may well be doubted whether Lord Lyndhurst would have held Mr. Furnival bound by his counsel's agreement, if it had appeared on affidavit, that such agreement had been made with a full knowledge that it was in direct violation of his client's wishes and instructions, although with the honest intention of promoting his client's interests. Lord Lyndhurst's decision, however, based as it is on the counsel's ignorance of important facts, tends strongly to shew that he did not hold the client conclusively bound by the agreement of his counsel upon the ground of general agency and implied authority, for had he so held, the counsel's knowledge or ignorance of any fact, however essential to guide his discretion, would be wholly immaterial in considering whether the agreement was binding upon the client in favour of the opposite party, who could not know what facts had been stated to the plaintiff's counsel. The case of Thomas v. Hewes (2 Cr. & M. 519) was also cited in the arguments, and claimed by each side as an authority in his favour. In that case the power of counsel and attornies to bind their clients was much discussed and considered; but Bayley, B., in his judgment, cautiously avoided defining the extent of that power. He referred to the application of Lord Falmouth, which was to set aside an order of Nisi Prius embodying counsel's agreement on his behalf, and the rule of Court made thereon, on the ground of want of authority; but said—'If a distringas is applied for against Lord Falmouth, he may shew that he has given no authority by his attorney to enter into this arrangement; and if so, it is probable that this Court would decline granting a distringas, and leave the plaintiff to his remedy by action. If we were to interfere in a summary manner we should be preventing the parties from taking the opinion of a jury on the facts, and of a Court of error on the law.'"

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—It appears to me that there exists a very unfair prejudice against the framer of the Joint-stock Companies Act, 1856. Your numbers have for some weeks teemed with attacks which, while lavishly belabouring the draftsman, totally exculpate, by their silence, the Government that conceived the measure.

To take, for example, "Examiner's" letter of last Saturday: he, in an attempt to disprove the assertion, that intelligible divisions into separate headings facilitate the comprehension of a subject, brings forward three instances, which, as far as I can see, are far from producing the desired effect.

1. He says that the plan he disapproves of "confounds distinct matters up in one act," and he complains of the want of a new winding-up act. Now, in the first place, it is clear that the Government (whether their policy was good or bad is not now the question) did not intend to have a new winding-up act, but to modify the regulations as to winding up in the manner the new act prescribes. The workman, therefore, who moulds a measure into words is not to be blamed for the policy of the measure. In thinking the last stage of the existence of a company "distinct" from the first and following ones, "Examiner" must have either forgotten that the present act is to consolidate the law, or misconceived the true aim and essence of consolidation, which is, I venture to think, to embrace the whole of the subject-matter treated of.

2. His second objection puts prominently patent one of the chief facilities of the method he abuses. He says that the possible necessity of a partial repeal of the act will add to "the complications and difficulties which so much deform our legal system." A partial repeal, if it should become necessary, cannot, under the method adopted, be either complicated or difficult. "Part —— of the —— Act, 185—, is hereby repealed," is as free from complication and difficulty as words can well express, does not interfere with or affect any other part of the act, and can add but little deformity to any system, however hideous it may be assumed to be.

3. "The confusion of permanent and transitory matter in one statute" is again another assumption, another begging the question. The parts that contain the transitory can be easily and intelligibly separated from those containing the permanent matter, and can, except by an unnatural elasticity of criticism, be scarcely "con*founded*" with each other.

REPEAL OF OBSOLETE STATUTES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—It may save some of your subscribers from making a wrong entry in their statutes if you mention that the titles of the obsolete acts repealed by the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 64, are taken from the folio edition of the Record Commission, which contains many variations from the common quarto edition, (particularly in the reign of Queen Anne); and that by the statutes which I subjoin in the first column are meant those which in the quarto edition are described as in the second column:—

THE MERCANTILE LAW CONFERENCE.

FROM a circular which we have received we gather the following particulars relating to this conference, which will be held on the 28th instant. It will be composed, first, of such members of the Law Amendment Society as shall desire to attend; secondly, of representatives of town councils, chambers of commerce, trade associations, law societies, and other public bodies of a similar nature; thirdly, of such peers, members of Parliament, merchants, and other persons as the committee of the conference may invite.

The objects of the conference are—

1. To discuss and bring under the notice of Government, Parliament, and the public, those imperfections in the mercantile laws of the United Kingdom which most require amendment.

2. To collect information from the various bodies represented at the conference as to the best legislative remedies for these imperfections.

3. To consider the practical steps which ought to be adopted for obtaining such legislative measures.

The subjects for discussion will be chosen and classified by the committee before the opening of the conference, and their selection will be guided by the communications to be received from chambers of commerce and other bodies by whom delegates may be sent.

Among the subjects already determined on are—1. The law of bankruptcy. 2. The law of partnership. 3. The law of merchant shipping. 4. The law of principal and agent. 5. The 17th section of the Statute of Frauds. 6. The law of banking. 7. Assimilation of the commercial law of England, Scotland, and Ireland. 8. Tribunals of commerce.

The order of proceeding will be as follows:—

On Tuesday evening, the 27th January, a preliminary meeting will be held at the rooms of the Law Amendment Society, 3, Waterloo-place, Pall-mall. The meeting will commence at seven o'clock. The final arrangements for the business of the conference will be made.

On Wednesday morning, the 28th January, at twelve o'clock, the conference will be opened. The subjects for discussion will be brought on in succession, according to the scheme previously fixed on by the committee.

On Thursday morning, the 29th January, at twelve o'clock, the conference will be resumed, and the remaining business be disposed of.

Lord Brougham will be the chairman of the conference.

"SUCH" AND "SAID."

A CORRESPONDENT of the Times makes the following observations on the use of these words:—

"In the letter from the Office of Works to the engineers to whom the metropolitan drainage question is referred, there is an extract from an act of Parliament which illustrates the proper and the vulgar use of 'such.'

"'The Metropolitan Board of Works shall make such sewers,' &c. 'as they think necessary,' &c., 'and such board shall,' &c.

"'Such sewers as they think necessary'—equivalent to 'sewers of the kind which they think necessary'—is right; but 'such board,' intended as an equivalent for 'the board,' is altogether indefensible.

"I believe that it was first used as a substitute for the legal vulgarism 'said.'

"Why should not 'the,' or 'that,' or 'those,' instead of 'such,' or 'the said,' or 'the same,' or 'the aforesaid,' be used in acts of Parliament and legal documents as well as in the most accurate scientific composition?

"The Irish lawyers use 'said' by itself, instead of 'the said,' thus avoiding the use of two words by rejecting the one which ought to be retained; and Mr. T. Steere, the United States consul, according to your report of his speech at the dinner given to Lord Panmure, followed their example, by talking of "the exports—to said provinces.'

"Horne Tooke long ago denounced the legal vulgarisms 'he the said' and 'they the said,' and they are given up by all but slavish adherents to old forms.

"Would it not be as well for the chairman of the committees of the House of Lords and the Speaker of the House of Commons to insist that 'such' shall never be used improperly in any act of Parliament, and that the use of 'said' shall be wholly dropped?"

[The objection to the word "said" as used by educated draftsmen of the present day arises from pure ignorance. Horne Tooke rightly pointed out that the double reference to "him"—"the said" was a pleonasm, but in modern drafts this does not occur; and the reference to a previously indicated person or thing by the words "the said" is not only correct, but necessary to precision, and it is the shortest expression that can be used for the purpose. The legal use of the word "such" is no doubt a perversion, but it is so convenient, and stands in the place of such awkward circumlocutions, that the most determined jurists have been compelled to submit to the use of it. The fact is, that though lawyers very commonly set down a great deal more than is necessary, their language, like all other technical language, is more concise than that of unprofessional writers.]

CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

The following sensible letter on this subject lately appeared in the Times:—

Sir,—On the trial of Dedea Redanies for murder, reported in the Times of the 20th December last, I find the following circumstance occurred:—

"Thomas Girling was called into the witness-box, and he said, that before he was sworn he wished to state that he considered the administration of an oath was merely a civil ceremony.

"Mr. Baron Bramwell asked him whether he believed in a future state of rewards and punishments.

"Girling said he did not believe in a future state.

"Mr. Baron Bramwell said that he could not be sworn, and ordered him to leave the witness-box."

As this person was called on behalf of the prosecution, and the prisoner was found guilty without his testimony, it may be presumed that in this case the rule which led to his rejection had no important effect; but suppose he had been the sole witness to a fact which could establish the innocence of a man on trial for his life under circumstances of great suspicion!

Surely it is time that this matter should be set to rights. There is nothing new to be said about it in the way of argument; the only obstacle to the establishment of a rational practice is the general unwillingness to disturb the existing state of things in connexion with a question on which a great deal of prejudice exists.

Nobody pretends seriously to believe that a sceptic is incapable of telling the truth, or is in any appreciable degree less likely to tell the truth than another man. We all know the contrary, and make no such distinctions in our daily dealings with our neighbours. Besides, what can be more irrational than to deny credibility to a witness because he himself makes a statement which is credited, and the making of which, moreover, is a very strong proof of his regard for truth? He might have kept his scruples to himself, and taken the oath decorously, like anybody else; but because he is too honest to do this, he is declared so utterly incapable of truth that it is useless even to listen to him. Observe, too, what an easy escape this rule gives to an unwilling witness; he has only to declare that he does not believe in a future state, and the law cannot touch him.

Great advances have been made of late years towards the establishment of the true principle as to the admission of evidence—namely, that all witnesses ought to be listened to, and that it is for those who hear them to weigh the value of their testimony; and I hope it will not be long before good sense has another triumph in the abrogation of the present religious test.

I do not say that there may not be cases in which a jury may properly disregard the evidence of a professed sceptic; all I say is, that it is preposterous to refuse altogether to receive it, when a man may confess himself to be a poisoner, a swindler, a burglar, and yet be admissible as a witness.

In connexion with this subject, I may also refer to the extremely foolish way in which custom requires judges and magistrates to satisfy themselves of the capacity of children who are brought to give evidence. They are to examine whether the witness "understands the nature of an oath." If the child can repeat the Lord's Prayer, and can say that "naughty boys who tell lies will go to hell," (which I humbly hope is very far from true, as a universal proposition), he is a competent witness; if not, he is rejected. Nothing can be more fallacious than such a test. Like the rule against sceptics, it is based on the entirely false assumption that there is no moral sense independently of religion. The credibility of children should be ascertained precisely as that of adults is ascertained—namely, by observation of their demeanour, and the amount of intelligence and consistency which they display, aided, if necessary, by the testimony of others.

I do not want to see judicial oaths abolished, because I know that, in point of fact, they do secure veracity in many witnesses; still no divine or moralist can allege that an oath adds anything to the obligation to tell the truth, which is absolute without it; and if a witness either objects to be sworn, or says that he considers it superfluous, his testimony should just be taken all the same, without any further ado.

Jan. 1, 1857. B. R.

Upon this subject we extract the following observations from Best's Principles of Evidence, (p. 212):—

"Atheism and other forms of infidelity, which deny all exercise of divine power in rewarding truth and punishing falsehood, remain untouched by Omychund v. Barker and the above decisions, and are still recognised grounds of incompetency. But ought this to be maintained, at least so far as casual evidence is concerned? Is it wise to leave in the power of every man whose breast is the repository—perhaps the sole repository—of evidence affecting the lives and fortunes of his fellow-citizens, to stifle that evidence, by pretending to hold erroneous views on the subject of religion? And even supposing the atheism, epicureanism, &c. ever so unfeigned and genuine, is it not more properly an objection to the credit than to the competency of the witness? For it amounts simply to this—that out of four sanctions of truth, one has no influence on his mind. The only case, as has been well observed, in which 'cacotheism,' or bad religion, is a legitimate ground for the exclusion of testimony, is where a man belongs to a religion the god of which ordains perjury; and the fanatic, whose creed allows mendacity in private and false swearing in public, is more dangerous in the witness-box than any form of infidel that could present himself. Even atheism, as justly remarked by Lord Bacon, 'leaves a man to sense, to philosophy, to natural piety, to laws, to reputation, all which may be guides to an outward moral virtue, though religion were not; but superstition dismounts all these, and erecteth an absolute monarchy in the minds of men.' Experience has ever shewn, that while an enlightened sense of religion and faith in the attributes and government of God raise the standard of truth, and establish a love of it in the human mind, superstition and irreligion alike lower the one and extinguish the other. And whatever might have been formerly urged in favour of the exclusion in question, it seems inconsistent to retain it at the present day, since the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 22, has allowed the unsworn testimony to be received of the members of certain barbarous and uncivilised races in the British colonies, who are described in that statute (whether truly or not is immaterial to our present purpose) as 'destitute of the knowledge of God and of any religious belief.'"

The following note is subjoined to the above page:—"'Of all the religious codes known,' says Bentham, 'the Hindoo is the only one by which, in the very text of it, if correctly reported, a license is in any instance expressly given to false testimony delivered on a judicial occasion, or for a judicial purpose. . . . . . Cases, some extra-judicial, some judicial, and, upon the whole, in considerable variety, and to no inconsiderable extent, are specified, in which falsehood, false witness, false testimony, are expressly declared to be allowable:—1. False testimony of an exculpative tendency in behalf of a person accused of any offence punishable with death. Three cases, however, are excepted, viz. first, where the offence consists in the murder of a Brahmin; or, secondly, (what comes to the same thing), a cow; or, thirdly, in the drinking of wine, the offender being, in this latter case, of the Brahmin caste.' . . . . The other cases stand word for word as follows:—'If a marriage for any person may be obtained by false witness, such falsehood may be told as upon the day of celebrating the marriage; if on that day the marriage is liable to be incomplete for want of giving certain articles at that time, if three or four falsehoods be asserted, it does not signify; or if, on the day of marriage, a man promises to give his daughter many ornaments, and is not able to give them, such falsehoods as these, if told to promote a marriage, are allowable. If a man, by the impulse of lust, tells lies to a woman, or if his own life would otherwise be lost, or all the goods of his house spoiled, or if it is for the benefit of a Brahmin, in such affairs falsehood is allowable.' (5 Benth. Jud. Ev. 134). We have verified his reference for these extraordinary statements. The above passages will be found in the translation of Pootee., c. 3, s. 9, in Halhed's Code of Gentoo Laws. The lower order of Irish, although timorous of taking even true oaths in general, commonly consider perjury to save a criminal from capital punishment either as no crime at all, or at most a peccadillo. To these instances may be added the principle laid down by Mascardus relative to confessions to clergymen, who, not satisfied with contending that such confessions ought to be inviolable, goes on to say, that if the priest be examined as a witness to prove what was stated to him in confession, 'potest dicere se nihil scire ex eo quod illud quod scit, scit ut Deus; et ut Deus non producitur in testem sed ut homo et tanquam homo ignorat illud super quo producitur.' (Mascardus de Prob. Quæst. 5 NN. 50, 51; 1 Greenl. Evid., s. 247, 4th ed.)"

STARKIE'S LAW OF EVIDENCE.—NEW EDITION.

A PRACTICAL TREATISE of the LAW of EVIDENCE. By THOMAS STARKIE, Esq. Fourth Edition, with very considerable alterations and additions; incorporating the Statutes and reported Cases to the time of publication. By G. M. DOWDESWELL and J. G. MALCOLM, Esqrs., Barristers at Law. Just published, in 1 vol. royal 8vo., price 1*l.* 16*s.* cloth.

"Fortunately for the Profession, the new edition has been intrusted to gentlemen, of whom one is well known, not only as a ripe and accomplished lawyer, (doctrinâ malidus), but as a judicious editor, knowing how to withhold as well as how to apply his hand. Amid the present plague of reports mere industry is not sufficient to qualify even a second-rate editor. . . . . It is evident that the editors have not been blinded by their respect for the author, but have altered, corrected, and amended wherever they have seen occasion. Such a course could not be pursued safely upon a small stock of learning or of judgment; and in our opinion it has been pursued, not only with safety, but with manifest advantage to the book; so that the fourth edition of Starkie is to the existing law what the first edition was to the law in 1824. . . . . We wish we had some means of identifying Mr. Malcolm's portions of the work. As it is, being hitherto unknown in authorship, he must be content with the praise of having borne a part where all was good."—Jurist.

"It is also the only work of which a new edition has been brought out at such a time as to render it possible that it should apply to practice, with any degree of consideration and accuracy, the modern changes in the law. . . . . We think the editors will have gone far towards restoring the admirable work of Mr. Starkie to its original character of the best work on the law of evidence which has yet been produced."—Legal Observer.

LONDON, JANUARY 24, 1857.

WE have received several communications on the subject of the Joint-stock Companies Act, upon which we desire to say a few words. With regard to two of them, viz. those of "Inquirer" and "Fair Play," the latter writer makes some complaints of the tone of criticism adopted by this journal, but the specific subjects of his complaint are the positions put forward by the former; and therefore we suppose that his general complaints are referable to the same source. As to those positions we give no opinion, but leave our readers to draw their own conclusions upon the points started; but so far as "Fair Play" means to complain of our articles, we beg leave to say that we have nothing whatever to do with the framers or promoters of this act, but only with the act itself; and we are quite sure that Mr. Thring would be the last person to suppose that those articles were written with any intention to injure him, or to give him any cause of offence. The history of the act is sufficient to shew that the draftsman cannot be responsible for its blunders, if blunders there be; for after much discussion, some amendments, and still more suggested, the act was entirely recast, and therefore it could not possibly be the work of one mind; and many of the difficulties arising from the altered state of the act might fairly escape observation. But the subject of our complaint is this—that when the Legislature proposed to pass an act professing to be a code in itself, a summary of the statute law on a subject of the greatest possible importance to the commercial world, and to remove difficulties and impediments to trade, it performed its task in so inefficient a manner as to raise a multitude of doubts, which will in all probability give rise to painful litigation. The first requisite in a statute on the subject of commercial law is that it should be clear; it had better be unsound than obscure; for in the former case either commercial practice accommodates itself to the bad legislation, and so removes the difficulty, or the impossibility of carrying out the law soon makes itself apparent, and a repeal takes place; but in the latter, where the law is like a many-headed sphinx, giving a different answer to each application, each man thinks that he has solved the riddle, and so rests content until experience teaches him that there is even yet another, and that a fatal answer.

We have also been favoured with a communication from a correspondent "H.," suggesting several doubts which have arisen in practice, upon each of which we will offer to our readers a few observations. The first doubt is, whether a trading company desiring to hold land must obtain a license in mortmain. Now, with reference to conveyances to corporations, it never was the law that they were void, but only voidable, at the option of the lord and of the Crown; and if those entitled to claim did anything which amounted to a waiver of their respective rights, the corporation remained unmolested. Then the rights of the lord became difficult to trace, and practically the license of the Crown became sufficient to confirm the property in the corporation, although in strictness it did not take away the right of the mesne lord to enter. Then came the 7 & 8 Will. 3, c. 37, by which power was given to the Crown to license corporations to take and to hold lands at its discretion. By the 1st section the Crown may grant to any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, their heirs and successors, license to alien in mortmain, and also to purchase, acquire, take, and hold in mortmain, in perpetuity or otherwise, any lands, tenements, rents, or hereditaments whatsoever, of whomsoever the same shall be holden. By the 2nd section lands so aliened are not subject to forfeiture.

In modern acts of Parliament establishing corporations power is usually given to hold lands without any such license, as in the case of the Act for the further Amendment of the Church Building Acts, (3 & 4 Vict. c. 22). Again: in the case of a private act of Parliament, establishing a particular company, as a banking or other trading corporation, a clause is usually inserted giving the company power to hold lands, and it has always been considered that that dispenses with the necessity for any license, or, at any rate, that such license is to be implied from the assent of the Crown to the passing of the act. The effect of this is, that such a company holds its lands by the provisions of the statute, and not by the license of the Crown; and it is submitted that the whole course of modern legislation with respect to commercial companies shews a tendency to dispense with that license; and if we now turn to the old Joint-stock Companies Act, and see the provision made under similar circumstances, and the interpretation put upon it, we shall be able to form some idea of what would primâ facie be likely to be enacted. The old statute, among other powers given to companies by the 25th section, enabled them to purchase and hold lands, either in their own name or that of their trustees, for the purpose of occupying the same as a place of business, and also (but with a license, general or special, first obtained from the Board of Trade) as the nature of the company's business might require. Doubts arose as to the meaning of that provision, to remedy which stat. 10 & 11 Vict. c. 78, was passed, by which it was enacted that the Board of Trade might, in their discretion, grant to any company completely registered authority to acquire, dispose of, and again acquire such lands as the company might from time to time desire; and the 1st section says, "such license shall be held to confer on such company the rights and powers therein expressed to be given in respect of purchasing, holding, and disposing of lands." Now, although this act recites the doubts which existed as to the provisions of the former one, it does not at all suggest that there was any necessity for a license in mortmain, nor does it provide against such necessity, and we may therefore fairly assume that it was not supposed to exist, otherwise a statute which professed to clear up doubts on the point, and to give the fullest power of licensing to the Board of Trade, would have also clearly declared the law upon this head. It is, therefore, conclusive that the power contained in stat. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, s. 25, is a power to hold lands without a license in mortmain, and we should not expect that the new act would be likely to re-impose a necessity for that license.

We will now turn to the provisions of the new act upon the subject; and having formed some opinion as to what the Legislature would be likely to enact, we shall be in a fit position to construe what it has enacted. We must always bear in mind that there is nothing to prevent a corporation from holding land except the law of mortmain; and that upon a gift of lands to a corporation the lands vest in it, and then the Crown, by virtue of that law, comes in and seizes them. When, therefore, the Legislature gives to a corporation power to hold lands, it in effect says, "We dispense pro tanto with the law of mortmain." The 13th section then says that the effect of registration under the act shall be to make the company a body corporate, with power to hold lands. The companies to be registered under this act are of two kinds—those established for any lawful purpose, and others for the purpose of gain; (sects. 3 and 4); and the statute prohibits the former (sect. 38) from holding more than two acres of land without the sanction of the Board of Trade, which may, however, empower them to hold any quantity; but there is no such prohibition applicable to commercial companies. Now, if our observations on the old act be well founded, it can hardly be contended that it is necessary to have the license of the Crown as well as that of the Board of Trade; and it is submitted that the fair inference is, that where the latter is not required, the former is dispensed with. The argument seems to stand thus—the old act says no companies shall hold land without a certain permission, which the Crown hereby delegates to the Board of Trade. The new act says that that shall be the case with non-commercial companies, but with respect to commercial ones it entirely dispenses with the necessity for such permission; and therefore, by implication, when it says that they shall have power to hold lands, it means that they shall hold them unfettered by those restrictions for which the consent of the Board of Trade is substituted. If that be not so, the effect would be to place the one class of companies, to which the objections provided for by the laws of mortmain are not applicable, in a worse position in this respect than the other class to which such objections are applicable, and to adopt a restrictive legislation in a matter where we have every reason to expect that it would be progressive. We cannot, therefore, doubt but that the meaning of the Legislature in this act, in giving to commercial companies power to hold lands, is the same as it has been in all other modern instances of like legislation, where such power has been given and such terms have been employed, viz. that they should hold them without any license from the Crown.

The next question is, whether the transfer of shares must be by deed? Our readers are of course aware of the discussions which have arisen from time to time as to the nature of the interest possessed by the holders of shares in mining and other companies possessing land, and as to whether they constitute an interest in land. Upon this point the statute has adopted the rule of the Companies Clauses Act, that under no circumstances shall they be considered as real estate, (sect. 15); neither are they "goods, chattels, or merchandises," within the meaning of the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds, but mere choses in action incapable of delivery, (Humble v. Mitchell, 11 Ad. & El. 205); and therefore there is nothing in the general law to invalidate a parol contract for the sale of them, and we must look to the particular provisions of the act, and see how far it makes a difference in this respect. Now, it does not expressly require such contract to be by deed, nor does it, we think, by implication; but the 20th section requires the transfer to be in a certain form given in the schedule, and executed by the transferor and the transferee. There is then nothing in that section to require it to be by deed, unless the word "executed" have that effect, which we think cannot be given to it. Then, if we may look at the form in the schedule, we find the usual form which has been adopted in many similar acts, or substantially the same, with this exception, that it concludes "as witness our hands," and does not add, as usual, "and seals." Now, although there may be a difficulty in giving much weight to the forms in the schedule, inasmuch as they are liable to be altered by the Board of Trade in its discretion, (sect. 58), still this may be taken as an explanation of the meaning of the word "execute" in the section, and as shewing that it does not require a deed.

We have given so much space to the discussion of our correspondent's first query, and not so much from any substantial doubt upon the question, as from its practical and important nature, that we shall be obliged to defer to another article the discussion of the other three which remain unnoticed, and which may properly form the subject of a separate consideration.

The meeting of merchants to discuss the legal and commercial bearings of Kingsford v. Merry took place on the 19th instant. It appears to have been conceded that the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber was right in point of law, and that the defendant had no chance of success by appeal to the House of Lords; but it was said that a portion of the mercantile community had been ignorant that such was the law, and at all events the law should be altered, so as to place delivery orders and dock warrants upon the same footing as bills of exchange, promissory notes, and bills of lading. By taking this course the meeting was enabled to consider the subject in a practical and useful manner, instead of raising the false issue which had been often suggested for its consideration in the city article of the Times. It is true, that the meeting was not unanimous as to the expediency of giving the proposed effect to dock warrants and delivery orders, and that one or two of its members made an attack upon judges for deciding according to the law instead of the wishes of commercial men. We are utterly at a loss to perceive any interest which lawyers can have in limiting the negotiability of mercantile documents, or any reason why there should be a "panic" among them on the subject. If it is considered expedient to unfetter these documents to the proposed extent, by all means let an act of Parliament be passed for the purpose, in like manner as the 3 & 4 Ann. c. 9, was enacted, for the enlarged transferability of promissory notes, when the merchants could not induce Lord Holt to adopt their views as the law of the land.

"The city is in a ferment. For weeks past a panic has been raging from Mincing-lane to Capel-court. The sages of Westminster Hall and the magnates of the Exchange are at loggerheads; and this very day a meeting is convened of our merchant princes, with the autocrat of European capitalists at their head, to make a solemn protest against a recent decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber. The question raised in the now famous case of Kingsford v. Merry, though of course perplexed as much as possible by the lawyers, is in itself by no means complicated. It all turns on the legal effect of that very familiar mercantile instrument commonly known in the city as a 'delivery order.' Substantially the problem is this—whether the assignment of a 'delivery order,' coupled with the possession of the goods to which it relates, to a dealer who has bonâ fide purchased or advanced money on them, does or does not vest in him the property in those goods, although the party assigning the order, and pledging or selling the goods, has fraudulently obtained possession of them from the original owner. In other words, is the bonâ fide holder for value of a 'delivery order' bound to make out a good title in the party from whom he takes it; or is it enough for such holder to shew, as in the case of a bank note, a bill of exchange, or a bill of lading, that he himself has bonâ fide given value for it? That is the real question raised by Kingsford v. Merry. The city says, that according to mercantile practice the latter of these two alternatives is the true doctrine; the Court of Exchequer Chamber holds the contrary. Is the Court of Exchequer Chamber right in point of law? That is one question—a question which can only be determined by an appeal to the House of Lords. Assuming that, in strict law, the Court of Exchequer Chamber is right, is the law itself right or wrong? That is another question—a question to be mainly decided by considerations of mercantile convenience. If the balance of convenience be against the rule of law, the course is plain. The matter must be settled by the Legislature, and a short declaratory act must be passed affirming the law in the sense of the mercantile community.

"We confess we can see no room for two opinions on the subject, when regarded as a question of practical convenience. On broad principles of common sense and common justice the case seems equally plain. A swindler obtains from a manufacturer the possession of goods, and of the 'delivery order' relating to them, by fraudulent misrepresentation: he goes to a dealer, who bonâ fide, and without knowledge of the fraud, advances to him a large sum of money on the assignment of the 'delivery order.' This, in substance, is the case of Kingsford v. Merry. In this transaction there are two innocent parties, one of whom, as it turns out, must be the sufferer. Which of the two is it to be? Clearly the party by whose act the mischief was occasioned—the manufacturer, who in fact, though not in intent, supplied the swindler with the means, the instrument, of procuring an advance from the dealer. Such is the dictate of natural equity. As to the argumentum ab inconvenienti, which, as the lawyers tell us, plurimum valet in lege, it is all the same way. These 'delivery orders,' 'wharfingers' receipts,' and 'dock warrants' have hitherto been regarded in the city as a species of negotiable instruments—as securities freely convertible into money by indorsement and delivery. Surely it would be an intolerable grievance if mercantile men, making advances upon such documents, or effecting purchases through their medium, should be compelled to trace a valid title through all their antecedent holders up to the original owner of the goods to which they relate. To hold this would be to impede the course of business, to arrest the development of legitimate speculation, and substitute the tedious minuteness of legal formalism for the brisk promptitude of commercial enterprise.

"The lawyers, indeed, contend—as we perceive by a reference to some of our legal contemporaries—that the merchants need not be alarmed at the decision in the Exchequer Chamber, because that decision has made no alteration in the law as it stood. It is on that very ground, we take it, that the apprehensions of the mercantile world are mainly founded. Their position we conceive to be this—either the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber is a correct exposition of the law, or it is not. If it be not, it can be set right by the House of Lords; but if it be, steps must be taken to get the law altered as speedily as possible by the interposition of the Legislature. Which of these alternatives is the correct one is a question rather for the lawyers than for ourselves. It may be that in deciding a 'delivery order' not to be negotiable like a bill of exchange or a bill of lading, the Court of Exchequer Chamber, as our legal contemporary THE JURIST contends, has correctly laid down the strict legal doctrine on the subject. It may also be that they have merely shrunk from making a precedent where they did not find one, and have declined to pronounce 'delivery orders' negotiable instruments simply because they have never before had this effect given to them in our courts of law. Bills of exchange and bills of lading, we are told, 'are negotiable instruments by the law merchant.' But what, we should like to know, is the 'law merchant,' except a collection of mercantile usages recognised by the judicature as having the force of law? Why should the mercantile usage, according to which 'delivery orders' have so long[*] been regarded in the city as negotiable, be entitled to less respect in Westminster Hall than the 'mercantile usage' which gives the same effect to 'bills of lading?' We shall be told, perhaps, that the usage in the latter case is of far greater antiquity than in the former. No doubt this is so; but if it be true, as we believe it is, that ever since 'delivery orders' have been known in commerce the custom in the city has uniformly been to treat them as negotiable, is it not absurd in our legal tribunals to refuse to recognise this custom, because the instrument to which it relates, and with which it is coeval, is itself of comparatively recent date? . . . . Let immediate steps be taken, by all means, for rectifying the law as laid down by the Exchequer Chamber, but let the meeting of to-day look further and aim higher. The important thing is not to encounter a legal blunder[†] with a commercial protest, but to organise an institution, by which men of business may permanently act on the law makers and the law administrators, so as to render such blunders less possible in the future. To neutralise the effect of such a decision as that of Kingsford v. Merry is no doubt a legitimate object for a great city gathering, but it would be a far more valuable result of the present agitation if it led to some plan for the immediate establishment of a Metropolitan Chamber of Commerce."

PUBLIC EXAMINATION OF STUDENTS.

AT the public examination of the Students of the Inns of Court, held at Lincoln's Inn Hall, on the 8th, 9th, and 10th January, 1857, the Council of Legal Education awarded to—

William Ritchie, Esq., student of the Middle Temple, a studentship of fifty guineas per annum, to continue for a period of three years:

George Alfred Marten, Esq., student of the Inner Temple, a certificate of honour of the first class:

Richard Copley Christie, Esq., student of Lincoln's Inn; John Edwards, Esq., student of Lincoln's Inn; and John Robbins, Esq., student of the Inner Temple, certificates that they have satisfactorily passed a public examination.

By order of the Council,

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—With respect to the remarks on the use of the words "said" and "same," commented on in your number of the 17th instant, it may add strength to your observations if I refer you to a passage in Co. Litt. 20. b., which will shew such words to have more significance than untechnical persons are aware of:—"If a man give lands 'to A. et hæredibus de corpore suo, the remainder to B. in formâ prædictâ,' this is a good estate tail to B., for that 'in formâ prædictâ' do include the other. If a man letteth lands to A. for life, 'the remainder to B. in taile, the remainder to C. in formâ prædictâ,' this remainder is void for the uncertaintie. But if the remainder had beene, 'the remainder to C. in eâdem formâ,' this had beene a good estate taile; for idem semper proximo antecedenti refertur."

While "said," therefore, is inappropriate where intended to refer to one of several antecedents, "same" is always appropriated to the last of them.

EQUITABLE MORTGAGE:

WHETHER THE REMEDY IS SALE OR FORECLOSURE.

IT is proposed to shew that both upon principle and upon authority, a sale, and not a foreclosure, is the proper remedy, unless the equitable mortgage contains an agreement to make a legal mortgage.

Regarding the question first upon principle and independently of authority, it may be useful to consider on what ground a legal mortgagee is entitled to a foreclosure. The foundation of his remedy appears to be, that by the terms of his contract he has acquired an estate in the nature of a conditional fee, voidable or defeasible upon the performance of the condition, and absolute and indefeasible if the condition is broken; whilst the correlative equity of redemption, which is implied as a consequence of the contract from its very nature, is a right to have the time for the performance of the condition enlarged through a Court of equity, in order to save the forfeiture that would result from the form of the instrument of mortgage, and a right to be treated as owner of the estate in the meantime. If the condition is not performed within the extended period, or such other period as the Court, under special circumstances, considers reasonable, the mortgagee is left in possession of the estate he has contracted for, and the mortgagor is barred from the only relief which a Court of equity affords him, namely, to redeem the mortgage.

Where, however, a legal mortgage does not contain a condition for redemption, and the fee is conveyed to the mortgagee upon trust, as in Sampson v. Pattison, (1 Hare, 533); Jenkin v. Row, (5 De G. & S. 107); and see also Dyson v. Morris, (1 Hare, 422), a foreclosure is not authorised, because there is no contract for the estate independently of a security, and consequently no forfeiture to be relieved against; and the default in payment gives the mortgagee a right to sell the estate, and the mortgagor a right to the surplus money after the discharge of the mortgage debt, by the express limitations of the instrument. It has, no doubt, been said that mortgages by way of trust are not, strictly speaking, mortgages at all, and some have gone so far as to doubt whether tacking would be allowed under them. But such securities are pledges of real property for money lent, and consequently mortgages; and it cannot be doubted that if they were framed in this mode, viz. "upon trust to reconvey on payment upon such a day, and in default upon trust for the mortgagee," the remedy would be a foreclosure. The interposition of a trust, therefore, will not deprive a mortgagee of that remedy. If it did there would be an end of the question, and a second mortgagee or an equitable mortgagee would never be entitled to foreclose. It is the absence of a contract for the estate in mortgages upon trust that precludes a foreclosure, which is a consequence of that contract.

[*] Our respected contemporary may not be aware that so lately as the year 1817 a jury of the city of London, said by Lord Ellenborough, C. J., to have been "a most intelligent jury," expressly found, that a person having mere possession of a "delivery order" was not thereby armed with such indicia of property as to be enabled to deal with it to others as his own. (See Boyson v. Coles, 6 M. & S. 14).

[†] This is itself a blunder. The law was properly laid down in both courts; they differed only upon their view of the facts in the case.

It is apprehended that a mortgagee of a chose in action is entitled to that remedy upon the same or an analogous principle. (See Dyson v. Morris). This position, however, is not altogether free from doubt, for in Slade v. Rigg (3 Hare, 35) Sir J. Wigram, V. C., decreed a foreclosure, upon the ground, that had the bill been for redemption, and been dismissed, such dismissal would have amounted virtually to a foreclosure; and therefore he considered a foreclosure might be had in the first instance as a substantive remedy. Slade v. Rigg was followed by Sir G. J. Turner, V. C., in Wayne v. Hanham, (9 Hare, 62). The observation which occurs upon these cases is, that if they were rightly decided, Sampson v. Pattison and that class of cases are not law, for in them the very same reasons might be urged in favour of a foreclosure, and with equal force; and yet they decide that such is not the remedy under instruments so framed. It is submitted, therefore, that Slade v. Rigg and Wayne v. Hanham cannot be supported upon the principle just alluded to; but inasmuch as there was in each a condition for redemption, which after default gave the mortgagee an absolute right to the property, and such right a Court of equity enforces under the head of foreclosure, it is apprehended that the decrees were correct in form, upon the principle now contended for.

In the case of a contract to make a mortgage, which is the intermediate step between a legal mortgage and an equitable one, the mortgagee is entitled to a legal mortgage, a foreclosure, or a sale: a legal mortgage, because that is the express contract, and the relief is specific performance; a foreclosure, because a legal mortgage would, if executed, have authorised it, and such relief is founded upon a well-known equitable maxim; and a sale, according to the practice of the Court of equity, which enforces a charge by such means.

Then, as to a mortgage purely equitable, whether evidenced by writing, or resting only on deposit, there being no express contract to pass the estate, (upon which, in the cases of legal mortgages, instruments framed after the model of legal mortgages, and contracts for mortgages, the right to a foreclosure depends), it follows that the right, if it exist, must rest upon an implied contract.

That this must be so is evident from the nature of the transaction. The deposit of the title deeds as a security constitutes a pledge at common law, and confers on the pledgee a good title to retain them against all the world until his demand is satisfied. (See Keys v. Williams, 3 Y. & C. 55). It, however, gives no right to the estate; but this equity supplies, by treating the deposit of the deeds as a symbolical delivery of the estate in security.

Now, in order that such a right should be implied, it should exist as an original remedy of the Court of equity. If it does, it is not derived from the civil law, from which most of the equitable doctrines respecting mortgages were taken, for according to that law a sale was the ordinary remedy, and a foreclosure could not in general be obtained unless a sale could not be effected. (See 2 Story's Eq. Jur., s. 1008). It has been shewn that in legal mortgages falling within the principle of Sampson v. Pattison a Court of equity will not imply any such right, which, if foreclosure were an original independent remedy, it ought to do; and that in contracts for mortgages there is an equitable remedy by a sale, independent of the rights founded upon the legal contract, and that such remedy is a sale; and the inference is, that foreclosure is a legal remedy, or, in other words, a remedy founded on legal principles, and a sale a remedy altogether founded on equitable principles.

Again: foreclosure is forfeiture. The implied right must be grounded upon an implied forfeiture. Now, forfeiture is not an equitable doctrine, it being a rule in equity that a forfeiture will not be enforced, much less implied: forfeiture, too, arising under a contract, which in a court of equity is viewed as a security for money, and in a court of law as an estate:—so much an estate at law, that a Court of law will not imply a covenant for payment of the mortgage money, and the relationship of debtor and creditor will not necessarily be implied from that of mortgagor and mortgagee, (see Yates v. Aston, 3 Q. B. 182):—so much a security merely in equity, that a Court of equity will declare void any restriction on the right to redeem the mortgaged property.

Again: the only essentials to an equitable mortgage by deposit are the deposit itself and the debt or sum to be secured. Now, the foundation of an equitable mortgage is, that it is an executed contract, and therefore not within the Statute of Frauds; and a Court of equity is to be guided, in administering relief under an equitable mortgage, by the same rules as under a legal one. It must, therefore, be held, that where, as is usually the case, the deposit is general, without naming any time for repayment of the money, the mortgagor has the whole period of his life to perform the implied condition; because, under similar circumstances, a legal mortgagee would have the same period to perform the express condition; (see Co. Litt. 208. b.); and an equitable mortgage cannot be put upon higher ground than a contract for a mortgage. See Lord Lyndhurst's decision in Teulon v. Curtis, (1 Younge, 610), where, in order to avoid the consequences, he held the instrument to be a Welsh mortgage, which, as Lord St. Leonards has shewn in Balfe v. Lord, (2 Dru. & W. 486), was a mistake. If, therefore, foreclosure were the remedy, it would, until very recently, have been to the exclusion of a sale, and in the great majority of cases the right to foreclose would have been postponed till after the death of the mortgagor.

In the cases of a mortgage and a contract for mortgage equity follows the law; but there does not appear to be any analogy between those cases and an equitable mortgage, the action of the Court of Chancery being diametrically opposed. In the former the Court leaves or puts the mortgagee in possession of the estate he has contracted for, and in the latter makes the estate available for payment of the debt. A legal mortgagee, except under peculiar circumstances, was not, until very recently, entitled to a sale, because he had not contracted for that remedy, and the aid of the Court was only afforded him to enforce his legal right to the estate; and as the law ignored, after condition broken, the fact that a mortgage was intended as a security, it followed, that a sale of the estate, and payment out of the proceeds, which are the necessary consequences of the equitable doctrine, that a mortgage was only a security, were denied a legal mortgagee. On the other hand, an equitable mortgage being a contract for a security, and not for an estate, and a sale being the remedy by which all other charges are enforced in a court of equity, it seems to follow almost necessarily, that in decreeing a foreclosure in the first instance, a Court of equity would be enforcing either a different contract from that which, according to the principles of the Court, it must hold that the parties have entered into, or else a contract in a different mode from that by which all other equitable contracts are enforced.

Having endeavoured to shew that upon principle a sale, and not a foreclosure, is the proper remedy in the case of a purely equitable mortgage, it remains only to establish the same point upon authority.

The first case bearing upon the question is the well-known one of Russel v. Russel, (1 Bro. C. C. 269). It appears, from the decree in the report office, to have been a case of a deposit of a lease by a person who afterwards became bankrupt, with a parol agreement to execute an assignment when required. The bill prayed a sale of the leasehold estate, and Lord Loughborough said, that as it was a case of the delivery of the title to the plaintiff for a valuable consideration, the Court had nothing to do but to supply the legal informality. An issue was, however, directed, and the deposit being established by a verdict of a jury, Lord Thurlow subsequently decreed a sale according to the prayer.

Featherstone v. Fenwick and Harford v. Carpenter, mentioned in the note to the last case, were also cases of deposits of leases; and it appears from 2 Spence's Eq. Jur. 791, note (c), that in the former the decree was by consent, and the equitable mortgagee was ordered to be paid out of the proceeds of the property, it having been sold; and in the latter, an account of the rents and profits, and an absolute assignment, without any time to redeem, were decreed.

In Birch v. Elames (2 Anst. 431) the argument was, that a deposit was an equitable mortgage only when accompanied by an agreement to perfect the conveyance afterwards; but Macdonald, C. B., in delivering the judgment of the Court, said, "The deposit of title deeds as security for a debt is now settled to be evidence of an agreement to make a mortgage;" and decreed a foreclosure.

In Newton v. Aldous (L. C., 18th July, 1804) the facts, as they appear in the decree at the report office, were special. The bill, however, stated that there was a simple deposit, and prayed a foreclosure; and the decree was, "Declare that the title deeds relating to the estate in question having been deposited in the hands of the plaintiff, the plaintiff is entitled to be considered in this court as if he was a mortgagee of the premises therein comprised, and decree the same accordingly; and in default of payment, &c., decree an absolute conveyance."

Lavender v. Roberts (Rolls, 28th June, 1806) followed Newton v. Aldous in point of form. The bill stated a deposit, with a parol agreement to make a legal mortgage, and prayed a foreclosure. The answer denied the agreement, and the decree was upon reading the proofs.

In Meux v. Ferne, (5th February, 1818), which was a case of a simple deposit, the bill stated that the security was scanty, prayed a sale, and was taken pro confesso.

Warner v. Barling (10th April, 1818) was against the administrator, widow, and heiress-at-law of the equitable mortgagor, and the bill prayed a foreclosure, or, in the alternative, a sale, as under an ordinary administration suit; and the decree was for a conveyance, with a reference also to the Master to take the usual accounts, and for the payment of debts in a due course of administration.

Smith v. Nelson (24th July, 1822) was against the executor of the equitable mortgagor by deposit of lease with a parol agreement to execute a legal mortgage. The mortgage had been prepared, but the mortgagor died before it was executed. The bill prayed a sale, and it was decreed.

In Langdon v. Wilmot (28th February, 1828) the estate was reversionary, and the bill was for a specific performance of a parol agreement for a sale obtained under pressure, or, in the alternative, for a legal mortgage; and the decree dismissed the bill, so far as it related to the agreement for sale, and was for a conveyance.

In Hiern v. Mills (13 Ves. 114) there was a parol agreement to make a mortgage, the draft of which had been approved by the mortgagor's solicitor, and the mortgagor had promised to call on the mortgagee and execute the ingrossment. The bill prayed a conveyance, and the decree was drawn up for a foreclosure as well as a conveyance.

Spring v. Allen (12th February, 1830) was against the heir, executor, and devisee of the equitable mortgagor, and the bill prayed a sale, which was decreed.

In Monkhouse v. The Corporation of Bedford (17 Ves. 380) a person who had paid off a mortgage upon property of the corporation deposited the mortgage deed with the plaintiff, and the bill prayed an assignment from the executor of the original mortgagee, and a foreclosure against the corporation. The contention on their part was, that the person who paid off the mortgage intended a gift to the corporation. They failed, and the decree was according to the prayer.

Most of the foregoing cases are taken from the registrar's books, and it does not appear that in any of them the question in dispute was argued. It is dangerous, therefore, to draw conclusions from them, because in some cases doubtless a mortgagor might prefer a foreclosure, and in others it might be quite immaterial whichever way the decree was drawn up. In Russel v. Russel, Smith v. Nelson, Hiern v. Mills, and probably Lavender v. Roberts, the mortgagee, as the law is now understood, would be entitled to a sale or foreclosure, at his option, there being in each an accompanying agreement to make a legal mortgage. In the two former a sale, and the two latter a foreclosure, was both prayed and decreed; and thus far the cases are pretty evenly balanced. With regard to Featherstone v. Fenwick and Harford v. Carpenter, relied upon by Lord Cottenham in Parker v. Housefield (infra) as authorities for a foreclosure, Mr. Spence's researches shew that Mr. Brown's note and Lord Eldon's recollection of these cases were inaccurate, and that no reliance at all can be placed upon them either one way or the other. Newton v. Aldous, Langdon v. Wilmot, and Monkhouse v. The Corporation of Bedford are simply instances in which decrees were drawn up for a foreclosure, the second in order being a case in which the main object of the suit failed, and the plaintiff took a decree founded upon a mortgage instead of a contract to purchase the estate; and in the last in order the contest was really whether the mortgage was subsisting. Meux v. Ferne and Spring v. Allen are instances of decrees for a sale, the one being an authority of the very slightest kind, being a bill taken pro confesso, and the other being a case in which it is doubtful whether the plaintiff would not be entitled to a sale on other grounds. In Warner (commonly called Warren) v. Barling the decree is clearly erroneous. (See the numerous cases in Set. Dec. 164, foreclosure and administration of assets in the same suit being incompatible remedies). Birch v. Elames, in the Exchequer, is certainly an authority in favour of foreclosure; but it would have been a sufficient answer to the defendant's argument that the deposit itself constituted the mortgage, and did not require anything further to perfect it; and its authority is very much impaired by being founded upon the supposed decisions of Featherstone v. Fenwick and Harford v. Carpenter; for Russel v. Russel can hardly be quoted as an authority for a foreclosure, seeing that the point decided by it was, that an equitable mortgage by deposit, being an executed and not an executory contract, was not within the Statute of Frauds, and that a sale was decreed, and not a foreclosure.

Ex parte Wright (19 Ves. 258) having been referred to by Lord Cottenham in Parker v. Housefield as an authority in favour of foreclosure, in these words—"In Ex parte Wright, Lord Eldon says that a deposit of title deeds was evidence of an agreement for a mortgage, and that an equitable title to a mortgage was in equity as good as a legal mortgage,"—it is proper to notice the case, as the quotation from it is calculated to mislead. It was a case of a petition in bankruptcy by an annuitant to prove in respect of the consideration for an annuity void for want of inrolment; and what Lord Eldon did say was, "This has been compared, and I have endeavoured ineffectually to follow that, to a deposit of deeds until a mortgage. In that case the deposit is evidence of an agreement for a mortgage," &c. Lord Eldon's opinion as to the nature and effect of an equitable mortgage by deposit may be gathered from Ex parte Coming, (9 Ves. 117), where he observes, that "previously to Russel v. Russel it was very much doubted whether a mere deposit constituted an equitable mortgage; but Lord Thurlow was of opinion, and that is not now to be disturbed, that the fact of the adverse possession of the deeds in the person claiming the lien, and out of the others, was a fact that entitled the Court to give an interest;" and from Ex parte Wetherell, (11 Ves. 401), in which is the following passage: —"The possession of the deed is, if no other purpose is shewn, evidence of an agreement that the estate itself shall be a security." It should be remarked that both these cases were upon petitions in bankruptcy, in which a long unbroken chain of decisions has established that a sale is the proper remedy. (See the note to Ex parte Coming). In the same case of Parker v. Housefield it is said that the decree in Newton v. Aldous was supposed to have been penned by Lord Eldon; but probably the supposition is grounded only upon the circumstance that the case is marked "L. C." in the registrar's book, and that Lord Eldon was then Chancellor. Be that, however, as it may, two points seem to be quite clear, namely, that Lord Eldon was aware of the distinction between an executory contract for a mortgage and an executed equitable mortgage by deposit, and that the precise question, whether the remedies under them were different, does not appear to have been raised in his time.

Pain v. Smith (2 My. & K. 417) is the first reported case in which there was a decree for a sale. The bill prayed an immediate sale, which was resisted on behalf of the defendant on the ground that all the plaintiff could claim was a legal mortgage, and supported on the ground that where there was no agreement for a legal mortgage, and the only evidence of contract was the deposit, the obvious inference was that the deposit was made as a pledge, not for a formal security, but for the payment of the money; and Sir J. Leach, M. R., said —"If the contract had been that the deeds should be deposited as a security until a legal mortgage could be prepared, there would be ground for the argument of the defendants; but there being here a general equitable charge upon the property, the plaintiff is entitled to a sale for satisfaction of that charge; and such has been the constant course of the Court, and the decree must be accordingly." In this case Sir J. Leach, though correct in the analogy between an equitable charge and an equitable mortgage, with regard to the remedy, forgot that redemption was incident to every mortgage, and the decree was drawn up for an immediate sale, and is therefore open to the observation made by the Vice-Chancellor of England in Brocklehurst v. Jessop, (infra), that it was incorrect; but he should have added, "in this respect."

In Parker v. Housefield, (2 My. & K. 419), decided about a year after Pain v. Smith, the decree had been drawn up by the registrar for a conveyance and foreclosure; but it was argued for the plaintiff, upon the authority of the last case, that he was entitled to an immediate sale; and Lord Cottenham, then Master of the Rolls, after time taken, said, "The question was, whether, in the case of an equitable mortgage by deposit of title deeds, the decree ought to give to the mortgagor six months to redeem, as in cases of legal mortgages. To determine this, it is material, in the first place, to consider in what light Courts of equity view such equitable mortgages; and it appears that a deposit of title deeds has always been considered as an imperfect mortgage, which the mortgagee is entitled to have perfected, or rather as a contract for a mortgage, which, according to the well-known doctrine of Courts of equity, would give to the party claiming the benefit of such contract all such rights as he would be entitled to if the contract had been completed." He then comments upon the cases in his own peculiar manner—that is to say, takes no notice of Russel v. Russel and Pain v. Smith, but cites Featherstone v. Fenwick, Harford v. Carpenter, and Birch v. Elames, and misquotes Ex parte Wright. He then proceeds—"Such being the light in which Courts of equity view equitable mortgages by deposit of title deeds, it would seem to follow that the remedy to be afforded to such mortgagees should as nearly as possible correspond with that to which legal mortgagees are entitled; and accordingly, from the search which I have directed to be made as to the form of decrees upon such subjects, I find that such has been the principle adopted." He then sets out the decree in Newton v. Aldous, which he said appeared to have been framed by Lord Eldon himself, and notices by name five of the other cases already referred to, and adds that the precedents were uniform in favour of six months' time to redeem being allowed, and orders the decree to be drawn up accordingly. Now, although the precise question was not before him, it is evident Lord Cottenham saw no distinction, in point of remedy, between a legal and an equitable mortgage; but it is equally evident that not long afterwards he changed his opinion, for in Metcalfe v. The Archbishop of York (1 My. & C. 557) he thus expresses himself—"It was then said for the defendants that all equitable charges rest upon specific performance and the right to have a legal charge. This is by no means so. The equitable incumbrancer has totally different remedies. What right has an equitable mortgagee by deposit to ask for a legal mortgage?" And again, in Price v. Carver, (3 My. & C. 160), where a decree had been drawn up against an infant for a conveyance, he added—"Whether this be the proper form of decree has not been argued before me, but the parties may probably be advised to consider whether a sale would not be the proper course." In short, Parker v. Housefield was a dictum supported only by Birch v. Elames, and opposed to subsequent dicta of the same judge.

The next case is Brocklehurst v. Jessop, (7 Sim. 438), in which Pain v. Smith and Parker v. Housefield were cited, and the precedents in the latter case, with the remaining ones before noticed, referred to; and the Vice-Chancellor of England said—"The decrees with which the registrar has furnished me shew that the decree in Pain v. Smith is manifestly wrong"—i. e. in decreeing an immediate sale. In Moores v. Choat (8 Sim. 513) the same learned judge observes, "that the depositary of a lease for securing a debt has a right to file a bill of foreclosure, and to have the lease assigned to him; or, if he has an agreement for a sale, he may file a bill for a specific performance." And in Ball v. Harris, (8 Sim. 485), "When a testator represents that he wants money for the purposes of a will, and deposits deeds for securing the money, the mortgage is perfectly good, except that the depositary has not got the legal estate;" and decreed a conveyance. It is well known that the Vice-Chancellor of England considered foreclosure the remedy, and the extracts from his judgments in the last two cases sufficiently explain his views upon the subject. Nevertheless, in Lewis v. John (1 C. P. Coop. 8) and Gilbert v. Hodgkins (24th March, 1848) he made decrees for a sale, though there was in the former an agreement in writing for a conditional surrender; and à fortiori, in his view of the law, there should have been a foreclosure.

In Thorpe v. Gartside (2 Y. & C. 730) a decree for a sale was made by Alderson, B., upon a bill praying a sale; and another instance (Bailey v. Gould) was cited from the decrees in the Equity Exchequer. The only point raised was, whether the sale should be immediate or in six months.

Tylee v. Webb (6 Beav. 552) was a complicated case of priority. The bill prayed foreclosure, and Lord Langdale, M. R., was of opinion that the plaintiffs were entitled to have a decree accordingly, unless the parties agreed to confirm the sale of the property which had already taken place, and go against the purchase money. In that case the proceeds of the sale were in the hands of the second equitable mortgagee, and the plaintiffs claimed at the bar to have the money applied in satisfaction, as far as it would go, of the first equitable incumbrance, and to foreclose the estate in the hands of the purchaser for the remainder; which claim was clearly untenable, for, as Lord Langdale observes, the plaintiffs were not entitled to the estate and the purchase money too. None of the cases bearing upon the question were cited, but inasmuch as a sale had already taken place, and the proceeds were inadequate to discharge the first equitable mortgage, Tylee v. Webb seems rather an authority in favour of foreclosure, in case a sale (that is, a satisfactory sale) could not be had, and to follow the civil law. In Mellor v. Woods, (1 Kee. 16), Lord Langdale made a decree for a sale according to the prayer of the bill, where the only question was, whether the sale was to be immediate or not.

In Tipping v. Power, (1 Hare, 405), which was an administration suit by an equitable mortgagee praying a sale, the question of the plaintiff's right to a sale quâ mortgagee arose upon the points of priority and costs; and Sir J. Wigram, V. C., says, "In the case of a legal mortgage the argument is this, that the strict right of the mortgagee is foreclosure; but if he chooses to consent to a sale, and takes the benefit of that course of proceeding, he acquires a new right. This does not apply to an equitable lien, for the party has no right but to a sale. His contract is, that he shall be at liberty to sell, and prove for the difference." In Lister v. Turner (5 Hare, 281) there was an agreement to make a legal mortgage, with a power of sale; and the bill alleged the security to be scanty, and prayed a sale. The cases were cited, and Sir J. Wigram, V. C., said, "The decisions with regard to the right of an equitable mortgagee are not uniform; but in this case the express terms of the contract are, that the mortgagor shall convey the premises by way of legal mortgage, and that such mortgage shall contain a full and absolute power of sale; and to make the suit available for its objects it is necessary that there should be a decree for a sale. There is no reason, therefore, why such a decree should not be made." In Allen v. Knight (5 Hare, 272) the deposit was accompanied by an agreement to execute a legal mortgage. (See 15 L. J., Ch., 430). The question was one of priority, and the decree was foreclosure. In King v. Leach (2 Hare, 57) and Jordan v. Jones (2 Ph. 170) the decrees were for a sale. In the latter case the bill prayed foreclosure or sale.

In Whitworth v. Gaugain (3 Hare, 416) there was an agreement to execute a legal mortgage, and the bill prayed a sale; and Sir J. Wigram, V. C., says, "To explain the effect of this transaction by the deposit and agreement to execute a deed, as between the mortgagees and mortgagor, I shall content myself by quoting the words of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland in the case of Rollaston v. Morton, (1 Dru. & W. 195)—'If a man has power to charge certain lands, and agrees to charge them, in equity he has actually charged them, and a Court of equity will execute the charge.'" And in the same case, upon appeal, (1 Ph. 728), Lord Lyndhurst says, "By the equitable mortgage the plaintiffs acquired a special lien upon the property. They might, through the medium of this Court, have compelled a sale of it for the payment of their debt, or they might, by virtue of the engagement for that purpose, have obliged the mortgagor to convert the equitable into a legal mortgage." The language of Lord Lyndhurst's judgment is remarkable, as being directly opposed to the Vice-Chancellor of England's in Moores v. Choat.

In Sims v. Helling (21 L. J., Ch., 76) the equitable mortgagor was dead, and the solicitor, who acted for both parties in the transaction, had gone to America. The property was leasehold, and the claim was against the administrator, who denied the deposit; and Sir J. Romilly, M. R., made the usual decree in the case of an equitable mortgage for an account and sale of the property. In Moore v. Perry (1 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 126) there was an agreement to make a mortgage when required, and Sir J. Romilly considered it now settled, that where a deposit of title deeds is accompanied by a memorandum containing an express stipulation that the depositor will, if required, execute a legal mortgage, the depositor is entitled to a foreclosure.

In Creswick v. Harrison (2nd March, 1852; Set. Dec. 211) it seems that Sir G. J. Turner, V. C., made a decree for a conveyance in the same form as Newton v. Aldous, but it does not appear under what circumstances.

In Burgis v. Moxon, (2 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1059), in which the facts were very complicated, the bill prayed a sale, and the equitable mortgage being established, Sir J. Stuart, V. C., decreed a sale, without comment.

In Carlon v. Farler (8 Beav. 525) the bill was by a judgment creditor, and prayed foreclosure or sale, and at the hearing the plaintiff insisted on an immediate sale. The defendant urged that he was entitled to six months to redeem. The Master of the Rolls took time to consider, and in the meantime the plaintiff agreed to give the time, and a decree for a sale was taken. In Ford v. Wastell, (2 Ph. 591), which was also by a judgment creditor, the bill prayed a sale; but at the hearing the defendant preferred a foreclosure, and the decree was made accordingly. In Footner v. Sturgis (21 L. J., Ch., 741) Sir J. Parker, V. C., refused a foreclosure, and made an order for a sale; and in Bates v. Hilcoat (Set. Dec. 216) the present Master of the Rolls directed a conveyance. Now, it is difficult to understand upon what principle either a foreclosure or conveyance can be decreed in favour of a judgment creditor, because he is not a mortgagee at all. It appears almost as unwarrantable as a foreclosure in favour of a simple contract creditor whose debt is charged by will upon the testator's real estate; and at least the balance of authority is against foreclosure in such cases.

Upon a review of all the authorities in which the question was discussed, it would appear that Sir J. Leach's opinion was in favour of a sale; that Lord Cottenham's was originally in favour of a foreclosure, but that he afterwards changed his mind; that Sir L. Shadwell's was in favour of a foreclosure; and that Sir J. Wigram's and Lord Lyndhurst's were in favour of a sale. Thus the balance of authority is in favour of a sale; and such being the result arrived at upon principle, it is probable that the next time the point undergoes a judicial decision it will be so definitively settled.

FINLASON'S COMMON-LAW ACTS.

Recently published, in 12mo., price 14*s*. cloth,

THE COMMON-LAW PROCEDURE ACTS of 1852 and 1854; with Notes, containing all the Cases either already expressly decided on or tending to elucidate them. With an Appendix, containing the Common-law Procedure Act of Will. 4, the recent Acts on Evidence, the New Rules to Michaelmas Vacation, 1854, and an Introduction. By W. F. FINLASON, Esq., Barrister at Law.

"This is, in our judgment, a most excellent and carefully written book. The equity powers given to the Common-law Courts are admirably done. The views taken by Mr. Finlason of the practical bearing and operation of these acts are remarkably shrewd and suggestive. Such men, and their editions of statutes, tend very greatly to improve the laws they expound, and powerfully assist the objects of the Legislature."—Law Magazine, Feb. 1855.

"We have now before us the work of Mr. Finlason, whose previous labours in expounding other statutes entitle him to the favourable consideration of the Profession. The notes to the various new enactments are very full and valuable."—Legal Observer, Jan. 6, 1855.

"This work is well done."—Law Times, Jan. 6, 1855.

CAUTION.—TO TRADESMEN, MERCHANTS, SHIPPERS, OUTFITTERS, &c.

WHEREAS it has lately come to my knowledge that some unprincipled person or persons have for some time past been imposing upon the public, by selling to the Trade and others a spurious article under the name of BOND'S PERMANENT MARKING INK; this is to give Notice, that I am the original and sole Proprietor and Manufacturer of the said Article, and do not employ any traveller, or authorise any persons to represent themselves as coming from my establishment, for the purpose of selling the said Ink. This Caution is published by me to prevent further imposition upon the public, and serious injury to myself.

⁎ To avoid disappointment from the substitution of counterfeits, be careful to ask for the genuine Bond's Permanent Marking Ink; and further to distinguish it, observe that NO SIXPENNY SIZE is or has at any time been prepared by him, the Inventor and Proprietor.

⁎ Orders for THE JURIST given to any Newsman, or letter (post-paid) sent to the Office, No. 3, CHANCERY LANE, or to STEVENS & NORTON, 26, BELL YARD, LINCOLN'S INN, will insure its punctual delivery in London, or its being forwarded on the evening of publication, through the medium of the Post Office, to the Country.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, JANUARY 31, 1857.

ACCORDING to the well-known rule which governs the administration of estates in bankruptcy, the joint estate of a bankrupt firm, consisting of two or more partners, is first distributed amongst the joint creditors of the firm, and the separate estate of each partner amongst his separate creditors; and, after all the joint debts have been paid, what remains of the joint estate is divided, and added to the separate estates of the several partners, in proportion to their shares in the partnership; while, on the other hand, the surplus of the separate estate of each partner, after his separate debts have been paid, is applied towards payment of the remainder of the joint debts; and after these have been fully satisfied, then, if all the separate estates have not been exhausted, any further surplus will revert to the several partners, according to their respective interests therein. This rule for the distribution of assets in bankruptcy, which was at an early period designated "a resolution of convenience," (Ex parte Cook, 1728, 2 P. Wms. 500), and was afterwards made the subject of a general order, (Lord Loughborough's Order, March 8, 1794), was probably founded upon one of the very first enactments made to answer the general end of the statutes relating to bankrupts, viz. that the assets are to be distributed equally amongst the creditors, or, to use the words of the stat. 34 & 35 Hen. 8, c. 4, "for true satisfaction and payment of the creditors—that is to say, to every of the said creditors a portion, rate and rate alike, according to the quantities of their debts." How, then, stands the case of a creditor holding a joint security against a firm, and a separate security against one of the partners in that firm for the same debt? At the common law, it is true, that if a man hold both a joint and a separate security, he may take in execution both the joint property of the firm and the separate property of the partner; although, on the other hand, the obligee in a joint and several bond cannot sue the obligors jointly and one of them separately at the same time. The bankrupt law follows the analogy of the latter rule, (Ex parte Rowlandson, 1735, 3 P. Wms. 408), but upon quite a distinct ground. It considers, that to permit a creditor holding both a joint and separate security to prove against the separate as well as the joint estate would be unfairly to diminish a fund to which, after payment of the separate debts, the joint creditors have as much right to look for the discharge of their claims as he has. It does not, therefore, invest such an one with the double character of a joint and a separate creditor, but permits him to assume either character at his pleasure; and it has long been an established principle, not to be disturbed otherwise than by act of Parliament, that such a creditor, whether the joint and separate security is given to him either by the same or by different instruments, must elect against which estate he will prove.

There is, however, a class of cases in which a double proof for the same debt has been sometimes admitted and sometimes rejected, and which has been supposed to form an exception to the above general rule; as, for instance, where the joint security has been given by an aggregate firm, and a separate or additional security by one or more of the members of the firm, who at the same time carried on a distinct trade. All the cases of this kind have recently been discussed in that of Ex parte Goldsmid, (2 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1106), from whence it appears that the law upon the subject has undergone several changes, and is not even yet thoroughly settled. We propose, therefore, to examine the most important of these cases, and to present the results to the reader in a compendious form.

In Laforest's case, 1797, (Cooke's B. L. 276), the holders of bills drawn by A. and B., partners in one trade, upon C. and D., who were partners with A. and B. in another trade, carried on under the firm of C. and D., were admitted to prove against both the joint estate of A. and B. (that is, the joint estate of the minor firm) and the joint estate of C. and D., (that is, that portion of the joint estate of the major firm which belonged to those two partners who had accepted the bills). In Ex parte Benson, 1798, (Cooke's B. L. 278), the holder of a bill drawn by A., a partner with B. and C. in one trade, in favour of B. and C., who were partners in another trade, and indorsed by B. and C., was admitted to prove against both the joint estate of B. and C. and the separate estate of A. These two cases were both apparently decided on the ground that the holder of the double security was at the time of taking it ignorant of the connexion in trade of the parties by whom it was respectively given. In Ex parte Adam, 1813, (2 Rose, 36; 1 V. & B. 493), the holder of a bill drawn by five partners in one firm upon two of those partners carrying on a distinct trade under another firm was held entitled to prove against both the joint estate of the five and the joint estate of the two. The reports of this case do not quite agree as to the reasons of this decision. From that in Vesey and Beames it would seem to have proceeded upon the ground that there was an express bargain for double security with distinct houses; from that in Rose, of the ignorance of the billholder that the drawers and acceptors were connected in trade. At all events, these cases established, first, that the holder of a joint security given by a firm, and also of a joint security given by several members of that firm carrying on by themselves a distinct trade, might prove against both the joint estate of the firm and the joint estate of the several members carrying on the distinct trade, provided that at the time of taking this double security the holder had no knowledge of the connexion in trade of the parties whose liability was thereby respectively represented; secondly, that in the absence of any such knowledge on his part, the holder of a joint security given by several members of a firm carrying on by themselves a trade distinct from that of the firm, and also of a joint security given by the remaining members, or of a separate security given by the remaining member of the firm, might prove both against the joint estate of the several members carrying on the distinct trade, and also against the joint estate of the remaining members or separate estate of the remaining member of the firm, as the case might be.

In Ex parte Walker, ex parte Wenslay, 1813, (1 Rose, 441), the holder of a bill drawn by A., a sole trader, and also a partner in a joint adventure with B., C., and D., upon B. and C., partners in a distinct trade, and taken for goods furnished by the holder on account of the adventure, and therefore with knowledge on his part of the connexion of the four partners, was, on the bankruptcy of A., and of B. and C., allowed to prove against both the joint estate of B. and C. and the separate estate of A., on the ground that here the bill was not drawn by one or more of the members of a firm upon the firm, but by an individual partner carrying on one trade upon two other partners carrying on another trade; so that, in point of fact, the reason of the original rule could not apply, for the separate creditors of A. could never have come upon the joint funds of B. and C., which they had employed in a distinct trade, nor could those joint creditors of B. and C., who had given credit to them as distinct traders, ever call for contribution from the separate estate of A. (See the observations of Sir G. Rose upon this case, 1 Deac. & C. 75, 76). On comparing this last case with that of Ex parte Benson, we find that in neither was the bill drawn upon the firm, and that independently of the knowledge of connexion, the only difference between the two cases is, that in Ex parte Benson the drawer and acceptors together composed the whole firm. In Walker v. Wenslay there was an additional member, who had nothing to do with the bill; and the reasoning in this latter case would seem to tell with equal force for the admission of the double proof in all the three first-mentioned cases, even if in these, too, the billholders had known of the connexion. In Ex parte Bigg, 1814, (2 Rose, 37), the holder of a bill drawn by A. upon, and accepted by, the firm of B. & Co., of which firm A. was a partner, was not admitted to prove against the separate estate of A., after having proved against the joint estate of the firm. In this case the holder was aware of the connexion of A. with the firm. Lord Eldon, however, in giving judgment against the double proof, did not stay to examine that question, but relied upon the circumstance that A. was not a distinct trader, and therefore he could not by any means come within the supposed exception. The next case in order is that of Ex parte Liddell, 1814, (2 Rose, 34), to which a mere reference will be sufficient, as it neither throws much light upon the main point, nor is it in itself entirely free from obscurity. In Ex parte The Bank of England, 1814, (Id. 82), the Bank, being the holders of a bill indorsed by A., B., and C., partners, to C., who also carried on a distinct trade, and kept a separate account with the Bank, and indorsed by C. to them in his own name, according to the practice of the Bank, who when discounting bills always required the individual indorsement of their customer, were not admitted to prove against the joint estate of A., B., and C., and the separate estate of C., but were obliged to elect. In this case the Bank were aware of the connexion of the parties; and it was held that the circumstance of C. being a distinct trader could not help them; because, as it was only a single partner who carried on the distinct trade, "that circumstance," in the language of the Court, "resolved itself into nothing more than a resort to his separate estate, which, resorting at the same time to the joint estate, a creditor is not entitled to in bankruptcy." Here the test for the admission or exclusion of the double proof seems to have been twofold—First, was there a distinct trade? Secondly, was the additional security given by several or by one only of the partners carrying on by themselves or himself such distinct trade? It follows as a necessary inference, that if the additional security had been given by more partners than one carrying on such distinct trade, the holders would have been held entitled to prove against both estates, even though at the time of taking it they had knowledge of the connexion of those partners with the major firm. In Ex parte Husbands, 1825, (5 Mad. 419; 2 Gl. & Ja. 4), the holder of bills drawn by A. in his own name, but on account of the firm of A., which consisted of himself and B., a dormant partner, and accepted by B., was not permitted to prove against the joint estate of A. and B. and the separate estate of B., although ignorant at the time he took the bill that B. was a partner in the firm, but was held entitled to prove against the separate estates of A. and of B. This case involved a consideration of the rights of a creditor against a firm composed of one ostensible and one secret partner, and is somewhat similar to that of Ex parte Liddell, with which it may advantageously be compared. It is, however, especially valuable, for the language of the Lord Chancellor in his judgment. "It is clear," said his Lordship, "that where a party takes a bill drawn by some members of a firm carrying on a distinct trade, upon the firm, in ignorance that the drawers constitute part of the firm of the acceptors, proof is admitted against both the drawers and acceptors; and it is equally clear, that a person holding a joint and separate security for the same debt is in bankruptcy bound to elect." These words tend to confirm the distinction between the cases where the additional security is taken from one, and where from several of the partners in the firm. In Ex parte Moult, 1832, (2 Deac. & C. 419), the holders of a bill drawn by the firm of B. & Co., which consisted of A. and B., on the firm of C. & Co., which consisted of A. and C., accepted by C. & Co., and indorsed by B. & Co. and A. & Co., which latter firm consisted of A. only, were not admitted, on the bankruptcy of the firms of B. & Co. and A. & Co., to prove against both the joint estate of B. & Co. and also against the separate estate of A., although at the time of taking the security they were ignorant that A. was a partner either in the firm of B. & Co. or C. & Co. In Ex parte Chevalier, in re Vansellor, (1 Mont. & A. 345), the agent of a foreign government, being the payee of a bill drawn by a foreign firm on one of the partners carrying on a distinct trade in England, was permitted to prove under a commission issued against the partner in England, but not to receive dividends without first electing not to prove under a process of insolvency issued against the foreign firm.

If we now examine together the seven cases last cited, the result appears to be shortly as follows:—They confirmed the first of those conclusions which we deduced from the earlier cases; they established this further proposition, that where a man held a joint security against a firm, and for the same debt a separate security against one only of the partners carrying on by himself a distinct trade, whether with or without knowledge of the connexion of the sole trader with the firm, he would not be admitted to prove against both the joint estate of the firm and the separate estate of the single partner; and finally they raised a new topic for debate—whether, where more of the partners than one carried on the distinct trade and gave the additional security, the holder of the double security would be precluded from proving against both the joint estates, by knowledge, at the time of taking it, of the trade connexion of the parties. This last question should, we think, have been answered in the negative. Had this been so, we should have had a principle to rely upon, which might have been applied as an easy test throughout this class of cases, viz. that double proof for the same debt will never be permitted against the joint and separate estate of the same person, but that it will be permitted against the joint estate of several partners, and the separate estate of another partner carrying on a distinct trade, or against two different joint estates, although the same person may be interested in both. This principle shines with more or less light through all the cases we have quoted. It is the only one on which, in our opinion, the exception to the general rule can consistently be founded, and indeed it renders that exception itself rather nominal than real. Unfortunately, however, this principle was annihilated by the case of Ex parte Hinton, 1847, (De Gex, 550). There the holder of a promissory note signed on behalf of a firm of six partners, and indorsed by a distinct firm consisting of three of those partners, he having at the time of taking the security had knowledge of the connexion of the parties, was not allowed to prove against the joint estate of the three as well as the joint estate of the six. So far the judgment followed the previous decisions; but in the reasons given for his judgment the chief judge of the Court of Review expressly departed from them. He discarded, and as we think rightly discarded, the question of knowledge or ignorance of the connexion; but he also held that it made no difference whether the additional security was given by one or by several of the partners constituting by themselves a distinct firm; forgetting apparently that the original rule itself amounted to nothing more than this, that one person could not unite in himself the two characters of a joint and separate creditor of the same person for the same debt, which a creditor did not in fact do by proving against different joint estates. This decision Sir G. J. Turner, L. J., thought himself bound to follow in the principal case of Ex parte Goldsmid, where it was held that a creditor, having a security for his debt upon each of two distinct firms, one of which consists of several members of the other, cannot prove against the joint estate of both firms. In this case the creditor had at least implied notice of the connexion of the members of the two firms; but his Lordship intimated, that upon the authority of Ex parte Hinton, the judgment would have been the same even if the creditor had had no such notice; and it seems therefore, that, with respect at least to knowledge or ignorance of connexion, no further argument should be raised in the discussion of this question.

Such is the present unsatisfactory state of the decisions upon the subject of double proof—a subject which it is to be hoped will shortly be brought before the House of Lords.

THE recent proceedings in the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of Reg. v. Clarke, in re Alicia Race, upon a writ of habeas corpus, brought by a Roman Catholic mother for the purpose of removing her child from a Protestant seminary, require our notice, on account of the interest taken in them by the public. Moreover, the judgment of the Court deserves the attention of the Profession, as therein the legal rights of a guardian for nurture are clearly defined. The facts of the case were as follows:—A sergeant of Marines, named Race, being a Protestant, married a Roman Catholic, by whom he had two children, a boy, now about twelve years old, and a girl, named Alicia, now aged ten years and a half. The children had been baptised in the Anglican Church, but during the lifetime of their father they had, with his consent, received from their mother such religious instruction as accorded with her own profession of faith, and had been by her taught to say Roman Catholic prayers. Sergeant Race was killed before Petropaulovski during the recent war, and his widow thereby being left destitute with her two orphan children, the royal commissioners of the Patriotic Fund placed the boy in a naval school in Dorsetshire, and the girl at a corresponding school at Hampstead, both of which are Protestant seminaries as regards religious training. After the children had been some months at these schools, the mother, with the consent of the commissioners, removed her son from the school; but upon her proceeding to remove her daughter from the asylum in which she had been placed, the girl refused to leave, intimating to her governess (so it was alleged) that she believed she should be disobeying God were she to return to her mother for the purpose of being brought up as a Roman Catholic. In consequence of this refusal on the part of the child, the executive committee of the Patriotic Fund declined to permit her removal; whereupon Mrs. Race obtained a writ of habeas corpus on the matron of the school, commanding her to bring the body of Alicia Race into court for the purpose of being delivered up to her mother. The return to the writ, inter alia, set forth that the matron did not detain the child against her will, but that she continued in the school at her own desire.

Before considering the principle upon which a Court of law proceeds in such cases, it is necessary to direct attention to the distinction between the power of the Court of Queen's Bench and of the Court of Chancery respecting parents and infants, which is shewn in the case of De Manneville v. De Manneville, (10 Ves. 52). The Court of Queen's Bench, being invested with nothing beyond a strictly legal jurisdiction to decide who legally has the right to the infant's custody, regards nothing except those causes which might exclude the father's right at law; but the Court of Chancery, representing the King as parens patriæ, has jurisdiction, in the event of the infant being made a ward of the court, to control the right of a father to the possession of his child, and to regulate its education. At common law guardianship for nurture belongs exclusively to the father, and the mother has no legal power over the child in the father's lifetime, except in the cases where, by Serjeant Talfourd's Act, 2 & 3 Vict. c. 54, the Lord Chancellor or the Master of the Rolls may, upon the mother's petition, if the child be under seven years, make an order on the father or testamentary guardian to deliver it into her custody. Upon the decease of the father without appointing a testamentary guardian, under the statute of Charles, guardianship for nurture, with all the rights belonging thereto, devolves upon the mother if living. One of the incidents of such guardianship is, that the guardian shall have the custody of the person of the child, for without this right he could not possibly perform the duties thus cast upon him. Following the language of the learned judges in the case now under consideration, "he is to 'nurture' the child: the legal sense of this word is its natural and common sense in the English language, which Dr. Johnson says is 'to educate, to train, to bring up.' Accordingly, from the cases to be found in the Year Books (8 Edw. 4, 7 b) to the present time, it has ever been considered that the father, or whoever else on his death may be the guardian for nurture, has by law a right to the custody of the child, and may maintain an action for trespass against a stranger who takes the child." (See authorities in Com. Dig., "Guardian," D.)

The question raised for the decision of the Court was, whether a guardian for nurture has an absolute right to the custody of a child until the age of fourteen, or whether between the ages of seven and fourteen the Court ought to examine the child, to ascertain if it has sufficient discretion to choose between the custody of its guardian and that of another person, "and, according to the degree of mental ability which it is found to possess, to hand it over to the guardian, or to liberate it, and desire it to go where it pleases."

It was contended that a guardian for nurture has only the absolute control of the child until seven years of age; but that as in criminal cases, although between seven and fourteen, an infant is judged primâ facie innocent, yet if he can discern between good and evil at the time of the offence committed, he may be convicted and undergo judgment, the maxim being "malitia supplet ætatem,"—so, if between seven and fourteen the Court considers an infant to have arrived at years of discretion, he ought to be permitted to select his own guardian. But it must be apparent, upon reflection, that the analogy will not hold, for malice is the effect of a depraved will, while discretion means judgment, which is an operation of the understanding; and upon this recognised psychological distinction the law proceeds when it attaches different legal capacities to different periods of infancy; for though an infant is sometimes deemed doli capax between seven and fourteen, yet in no case, except for necessaries, is he considered to possess sufficient discretion between those ages to bind himself by a contract; and Blackstone, when he states that an infant between seven and fourteen may be convicted, and undergo judgment and execution, adds, "though he hath not attained to years of puberty or discretion;" whereby it is apparent that the distinction to which we have alluded must have been observed by that writer. (See also 1 Hale's P. C. 26).

The judgment of the Court is certainly conformable to justice and reason, as it is doubtless sound in point of law; for if the position contended for by the learned advocate who appeared on behalf of the child had been held to have been law, the most absurd, as well as disastrous, contentions in families might have followed. "The intellectual faculties of the child," said the Court, "may be considerably developed in that interval," (i. e. between seven and fourteen), "and the child may now have a very strong inclination to leave the home of the guardian, and, from religious as well as frivolous motives, to be educated at a different school from that which the guardian has selected. But the consequences which would follow from allowing such a choice are most alarming. We must lay down a rule which will be generally beneficial, although it may operate harshly in particular instances. If the proposed choice were given to the child, the relation of guardian and ward would still subsist; the guardian might retake the child wherever he found it, and he might maintain an action against the person who, contrary to his wishes, takes or detains the child. Then how could 'nurture' be carried on with such a doctrine, which, if established, would apply to every father of a family in the kingdom in respect of all his children, male and female, above the age of seven years? If a father wishes to take his son, when ten years old, from a private school where flogging is not practised, and send him to Eton, and the boy refuses to come home, and is brought up by habeas corpus, is he to be permitted to say, that, on consideration, he is of opinion that the private school is preferable to any public school where flogging is permitted, and therefore makes his election to return to the private school, the master being willing to receive him? Or suppose that a Protestant mother, guardian for nurture of a daughter seven years of age, sends her to a boarding-school professing to be a Protestant seminary; in a short time she finds that attempts have been successfully made by teachers there to convert the girl to the Roman Catholic faith; the girl refuses to come home, saying, in analogy to the language used by Alicia Race, 'I will not go home to my own mother; I will stay here, where I may pray to the mother of God;' she is in consequence brought up by habeas corpus. Are we to examine her, and, finding her of quick parts, and professing to be a sincere convert to the Roman Catholic faith, to tell her, that, in spite of the wishes of her mother, she is at liberty to return to the school where she has been converted? Such a doctrine seems wholly inconsistent with parental authority, which both reason and revelation teach us to respect as essential for the welfare of the human race."

In the course of the argument it was said that a child of the age of Alicia Race was as susceptible of receiving religious truth as an adult, and allusions were made to the workings of prevenient grace, and to the words, "Suffer little children to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven;" but the Court observed, that it was impossible, without irreverence, to shew how utterly beside the question such allusions were; and we would recommend those who wish to decide points of law by reference to the Scriptures to ponder upon the following observations of Lord Denman in the case of Reg. v. Chadwick, (11 Q. B. 203, 232):—"It has been argued here that the judges of the common-law courts, who may now be called upon to decide these questions," (marriages within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity), "must take their rule from the Scriptures. But what Scriptures? If I am called upon to determine what the law of God is, am I to be bound by what a particular translation tells me? We have been occupied here by a discussion of five days, in which as many different interpretations have been put upon the text under dispute."

The case of Rex v. Greenhill (4 Ad. & El. 624) decided, that where a young person under twenty-one years of age is brought before the Court by habeas corpus, if he be of an age to exercise a choice, the Court leaves the infant to elect where he will go. The case now under consideration decides that it is not until after fourteen that the infant is deemed of an age capable of exercising such choice. Until that age, when the child is unlawfully detained from its guardian, it is supposed to be unlawfully imprisoned; and when brought up under a habeas corpus and delivered to him, the child is deemed to be set at liberty. (Rex v. Mandeville, 5 East, 220). But though the legal right of a guardian for nurture be as above described, the guardian may have forfeited his right by prior immoral conduct, or by having some illegal act in view when possession of the child has been obtained. "The right of the father would not be acted upon where the enforcement of it would be attended with danger to the child, as where there is an apprehension of cruelty, or of contamination by some exhibition of gross profligacy," (per Lord Denman, C. J., in Rex v. Greenhill); our law in this respect being conformable to the maxim of the civil law, that "patria potestas in pietate debet, non in atrocitate, consistere." In the case we are now discussing, the Court, being of opinion that no immorality whatever could be imputed to Mrs. Race, but that she was a virtuous woman, decided that as guardian for nurture she was entitled to all the rights belonging to a mother as surviving parent; and moreover, that as her husband had not appointed her testamentary guardian, with directions that the children should be trained as Protestants, she was under no legal obligation to educate them in the principles of that faith; for the cases of Villareal v. Mellish, (2 Swanst. 536), a perusal of which we would recommend, as being analogous to that of Alicia Race, and Talbot v. The Earl of Shrewsbury, (4 My. & C. 672), shew that in such matters the Courts know of no distinction between different religions, and will not interfere with the discretion of guardians as to the faith in which they educate their wards.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—As your valuable paper has been at all times open to practical suggestions for the reform of the law, I trust you will permit me to bring before your readers a subject of gravest concern to many suitors, viz. the system of referring causes at the trial to an arbitrator chosen by the parties. No excrescence on our legal institutions more needs the attention of the law reformer. The peculiar abuse, in the present state of things, is, that while a reference is contemplated as the only legitimate mode of terminating a vast number of disputes—those particularly which are likely to arise between people in trade—there is, nevertheless, no effort on the part of the Executive to provide the public with the necessary tribunal. Surely, if it be essential to the administration of justice that courts of arbitration should exist, as well as the established tribunals of the country, it is only right that the former should be provided, equally with the latter, at the public expense.

At present the suitor in any of those cases in which the judge is said "irresistibly to press a reference" must either abandon his rights or consent to construct a tribunal for himself; he must pay a judge, hire a court, give extraordinary fees to counsel, and incur delays and expenses many times greater than those required for an ordinary trial. Then what is the result, if he be courageous enough to go on? Can any judicial institution be less creditable to the nation than the arbitrator in his mimic court, lord of misrule, as he too frequently is, surrounded by embarrassments against which justice would struggle in vain in the constituted tribunals, and compelled to pronounce his judgment with a technical precision which all other judges have somehow managed to avoid? It is quite clear, that unless the arbitrator be a most patient and painstaking man, he will never be placed in full possession of the evidence; and unless he be unusually learned in an unattractive department of law, the chances are greatly in favour of a successful application from the disappointed litigant to set aside or alter his award.

It may be said that the selection of the arbitrator rests with the parties, and they are therefore fairly responsible for his shortcomings. But it is notorious that arbitrators are selected by the counsel on each side, and generally of necessity from among those members of the Bar who have least to do. It often happens that counsel and litigants are alike in the dark as to the fitness of their nominee for the duties imposed on him.

The practical suggestions I would offer are these—that a body of arbitrators should be appointed, who should be paid by the nation; that their competency should be ascertained by examination into their knowledge of the rules of evidence, and the peculiar duties of arbitrators.

Such a system would, it seems to me, be a remedy for the worst grievances of the present state of things, and afford an admirable school for training men for judicial offices.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
S. W.

PAYMENT OF DUTY ON A LEGACY CHARGED WITH AN ANNUITY.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

Sir,—By stat. 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, s. 9, the duty on a legacy charged with an annuity is to be calculated on the amount of the legacy after deducting the value of the annuity according to the tables. This section is still in force. It works well for the relief of the executor, who can thus clear himself by making one immediate payment of duty in respect of the legacy. But the section does not find favour at Somerset House. The authorities there, when an executor proposes to make payment in the manner prescribed by this section, require him instead, first, to pay duty on the amount of the legacy after deducting a sum which at 4*l.* per cent. will yield interest equal to the annuity, and then, on the determination of the annuity, to pay duty on the deducted sum. The executor or trustee, whose ordinary duties are never too small, has thus a prolonged responsibility, contrary to the act.

In practice, if the executor makes a firm stand on sect. 9, the authorities are in the habit of yielding; but what right have they for one moment to require payment according to their own plan? And may not this official plan of deferred payment cause occasional loss to the revenue through the intervening insolvency of parties liable to the payment?

I am, sir, yours &c.,
Middle Temple, Jan. 19, 1857. A. B.

EXAMINATIONS AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.—Hilary Term, 1857.

At the examination of candidates for admission on the roll of attornies and solicitors of the superior courts, the examiners recommended as deserving of honorary distinction—

Charles Wright, of Sunderland, who served his clerkship to Mr. Joseph John Wright, of Sunderland, and Messrs. Maples, Maples, & Pearce, of Frederick's-place, Old Jewry.

Alfred Beaven, of Highway, Wiltshire, who served his clerkship to Mr. Arthur Gore, of Melksham, and Messrs. Smith & Shepherd, of Golden-square.

Henry Cipriani Potter, of Inverness-terrace, Hyde Park, who served his clerkship to Mr. James Leman, of Lincoln's-inn-fields.

The Council of the Incorporated Law Society have accordingly awarded the first prize of books to be presented to Charles Wright, and the second prize of books to be presented to Alfred Beaven and Henry C. Potter. By order of the Council,

R. Maugham, Secretary.

MERCANTILE-LAW CONFERENCE.—LAW OF BANKRUPTCY.

The following paper upon the law of bankruptcy was read by Mr. Commissioner Ayrton at the meeting of this conference on the 28th inst.:—

"The matter which I have the honour to bring before this important meeting is the improvement of the bankrupt laws. Your time is so precious that I have endeavoured to make my paper as short as possible, which will partly account for some obscurity and abruptness in style. There are important questions of principle and many matters of detail in which improvement may be made, but which I must omit—the time will not allow me even to mention them. The question which I propose to consider is, whether the present system of administration of the bankrupt laws requires any and what practical amendment. The two great complaints which it has fallen to my lot to hear are—first, that it is too expensive; and, secondly, that the punishments inflicted are uncertain and inadequate. But expense is the great complaint. Now, the Court of Bankruptcy being a mercantile court, its expenses are taken out of bankrupt estates, and fall exclusively upon those who suffer by bankruptcies; and if those persons allege that the expense of their own court is too great, I apprehend that the complaint is entitled to be heard with respectful attention, and that it is the duty of practical men to point out the remedy, if there be one. In working a bankruptcy with the smallest possible amount of assets—that is, with only 150*l.*—at least 100*l.* will be swallowed up in expenses. As the assets increase, so the expenses swell up, though not in the same ratio, to 200*l.*, 300*l.*, and 400*l.*, till, in such cases as the Royal British Bank, the ordinary working expenses will be as many thousands of pounds. The expense of the Court of Bankruptcy is now greater than it will be a few years hence—first, because the large sum (about 28,000*l.* annually) now paid for pensions and compensations will, of course, cease as the annuitants die; and, secondly, because the permanent expenses of the court are to be diminished by reducing the commissioners to four in London and to seven in the country, thus saving the expense of seven commissioners and seven registrars, or 18,000*l.* annually. That the gross expenses of the court are too great is apparent from the fact that its expenditure has exceeded its income for many years. In order to enable this meeting to form an opinion on this question of expense, I am compelled to bring forward a few figures. I know how distasteful figures sometimes are, but on the present occasion my apology is, that figures cannot be avoided if we wish to form anything like an accurate judgment. The fund for payment of the compensations and for the salaries of the existing officers of the Court of Bankruptcy is raised by a stamp duty of 10*l.* on every petition for adjudication, and a per-centage on the dividend paid in each bankruptcy. The following table will give a tolerably correct idea of these annual expenses:—

Compensations and pensions (about)	£28,000
Accountant in bankruptcy and clerks	6,380
Five London commissioners (2000*l.* each)	10,000
Eleven country ditto (1800*l.*)	19,800
Taxing Master and clerks	1,650
Seven London registrars (1000*l.*)	7,000
Twelve country ditto (800*l.*)	9,600
Five London ushers (100*l.*)	500
Eleven country ditto (80*l.*)	880
Chief registrar's clerks (four)	905
Travelling expenses of country commissioners and registrars (about)	1,000
	£85,715

"In addition to which sums, the solicitors, official assignees, and messengers have to be paid. How much these receive I cannot accurately state, but I believe that the following will be below rather than above the mark:—

Estimate—Annual.

Solicitors' bills, London and country	£100,000
	£149,600

"The first item is 28,000*l.* a year for compensations and pensions for abolished offices. Before the reform of the bankruptcy system by Lord Brougham in 1832, fees were payable on issuing commissions, and payable to some 700 commissioners of bankruptcy, distributed over the country. The Legislature thought fit to abolish these fees and commissionerships, and, with great justice, gave pensions and compensation to those who suffered by the abolition. But is it not unjust to saddle these compensations upon bankrupt estates in the present day? The mercantile world with justice complains at having to pay for two sets of officers—the old ones, who were abolished, and the new ones, who were created. Assuming that the working expenses of the present Court of Bankruptcy ought to be paid out of bankrupts' estates, surely it would be proper that this sum of 28,000*l.* for compensations, from which bankrupt estates derive no advantage whatever, should be charged upon the Consolidated Fund. As regards the working expenses of the Court of Bankruptcy, from returns made to Parliament last year I have prepared a table of the expenses of the court in which I act in Leeds, which I have averaged, and which will, I hope, give some idea of the expenses of working a bankruptcy:—

Number of bankruptcies .... 121 = 40 1-3rd

Average time of working .... 3¼ years.

	Total.			Average.
Gross sum collected	£90,627	16	8	£748	19	9
Amount divided	44,377	2	10	366	14	8
Solicitors' charges in bankruptcy	14,320	14	3	118	6	11
Ditto suits, actions, indictments	428	1	0	3	10	8
Official assignees' charges:—
Per-centage on remuneration	5,671	12	4	46	17	5
Stationery, &c.	900	12	5	7	8	10
Miscellaneous	97	11	0	0	16	0
Per-centage to chief registrar	3,103	6	6	25	12	11
Messenger	3,569	12	7	29	10	0
Broker	634	15	7	5	4	11
Rent	3,031	1	9	25	1	0
Taxes	404	8	11	3	6	10
Wages	1,064	12	1	8	15	11

"The average of solicitors' bills is 121*l.*; but from this is to be deducted a stamp duty of 10*l.* paid on each petition, reducing the average of each bill to 111*l.* This sum of 10*l.* must be added to the per-centage paid to the chief registrar, making the average 27*l.* Each Court of Bankruptcy consists of the following officers:—1. A commissioner; 2. A registrar to assist the commissioner; 3. An usher; 4. An official assignee; 5. A messenger, who seizes the property; 6. A broker, who makes a list of the property seized by the messenger; 7. An auctioneer, who sells the property; 8. The creditors' assignees; 9. The solicitor; 10. The bankrupt's accountant. Besides this staff there are—11. An accountant in bankruptcy; 12. A taxing master in London; 13. To keep all in order, there is a costly appeal to the Lords Justices, and from them to the House of Lords; 14. And over all is the Lord Chancellor, assisted by a secretary of bankrupts. This large array of officers contrasts unfavourably with the number of persons found necessary under a deed of assignment, in which case all that are essential appear to be—1. A solicitor; 2 Some trustees; 3. An accountant.

"The Registrars.

"It has been asked whether the registrars are necessary? In the country districts there is eventually to be but one commissioner in each district, who must sit daily; in case of his illness, and to enable him to take vacation, the registrar can act for him; and the country registrar has to tax the bills of costs of the solicitors: it therefore appears to me that the country registrars cannot well be dispensed with. In London it is different; the commissioners there sit for each other, and there is a taxing master in London: it therefore appears to me that the London registrars may be dispensed with.

"The Taxing Master.

"As regards the very able taxing master in London, it appears to me that his office is wholly unnecessary if the London registrars are continued; and if the master is continued, as I think he should be, then I perceive no necessity for the registrars.

"The Messenger.

"Another item of expense is the messenger, whose business is by no means pointed out by his name, his duty being, not to carry messages, but to seize the bankrupt's property. The messengers are useful and meritorious officers; they occasionally incur considerable responsibility, and their duties require temper, discretion, integrity, and a certain knowledge of law; consequently they ought to be well remunerated. But I think that they are too highly paid, and that, if the office is retained, the scale of their allowances or fees ought to be reduced. But I perceive no sufficient reason why the office of messenger should not be abolished. In former times the commissioners of bankruptcy sat only now and then, at long intervals, having little, if any, control over the assignees. In those days the messenger, who was answerable to the commissioners, was not merely useful, but absolutely essential; they are still useful, no doubt, but by no means essential, because the official assignee in no respect resembles the old creditors' assignees; he is a responsible man of business, constantly under the eye of the commissioner. I therefore propose that the office of messenger be abolished, and his duties transferred to the official assignee, who can employ competent persons to take possession of the property. I cannot perceive that this will be any hardship upon the official assignee. The estate vests in him, and if the same estate were vested in trustees under an assignment, they would find it no hardship to put proper persons in possession on their behalf.

"The Broker.

The broker is a new officer, who sprung up in the Court of Bankruptcy I do not know how. Formerly the messenger made a list or inventory of the property which he seized; latterly it was thought that this inventory should be made by a separate person—some broker; and thus the broker came to be a recognised officer; and as the poor man must live, his employment in all cases came to be a matter of course. The office should be abolished. If in particular cases the commissioner or the assignees should find it expedient to have an inventory or valuation made, there will be no difficulty in finding a broker in the next street. There is no necessity for a permanent officer.

"I believe that it is not easy to exaggerate the importance of this officer. I know, however, that a very general opinion prevails that the expense of this officer presses too heavily upon bankrupt estates. Seeing the importance of the officer, and recognising the necessity, as a general principle, of keeping men honest who are largely trusted, I would not advocate the reduction of their incomes too low, but I would give them more real work to do than they have at present. It is to be observed that the number will be reduced when the courts are reduced to four in London and seven in the country. The official assignees are now paid by a scale—so much per cent. for the amount got in, and so much per cent. on the amount divided. It was intended that this remuneration should bear a proportion to the work done, but I am sorry to have to declare my opinion that such is not the case. The small bankruptcies, which require much labour to collect numerous small debts, remunerate the official assignee badly, or not at all; while a large bankruptcy, as a banker's, which gives the least possible amount of trouble, may pay the official assignee a very large sum indeed. I know of a banker's estate in which, with the minimum of trouble, the official assignee received within the first twelve months a sum of 5000*l.* for remuneration. If the payment by scale was founded on any idea of averages, the returns made to Parliament of the incomes of the different official assignees proves the idea to be without foundation. One official assignee may be several years in office, and receive scarce sufficient to enable him to buy bread and cheese, while another may make a small fortune in a few months. It appears to me that the official assignee should be paid a fixed salary of 800*l.* a year, and also from 250*l.* to 300*l.* a year for office expenses. In addition to this, I would enable the commissioner to allow a sum, varying from 1*l.* to 20*l.* in each bankruptcy, for examining accounts and general diligence. This would give the commissioner some check and control, (which it is quite essential that he should have), and would give the official assignee a motive for being careful and diligent; in a word, would furnish that stimulus which is said to be so essential in order to prevent duty being performed in that languidly correct manner which leaves nothing to be complained of, but everything to be desired. If the office of messenger were abolished, then, as the whole of the bankrupt's property is invested in the official assignee, he appears to be the proper person to take steps to secure it. I would also require the official assignee to prepare the bankrupt's balance-sheet in all ordinary cases. On this subject I shall say a few words hereafter.

Head Banking-house—Threadneedle-street.
Charing-cross Branch—No. 450, West Strand.

At a SPECIAL GENERAL MEETING of the SHAREHOLDERS held at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street, on Monday, the 26th January, 1857, present—

JOHN GRIFFITH FRITH, Esq., Vice-Chairman.

DIRECTORS.

John Edmund Anderdon, Esq.
Col. William Elsey, H.E.I.C.S.
Thomas Gooch, Esq.
Jeremiah Greatorex, Esq.
Alex. Constantine Ionides, Esq.
Thomas Luce, Esq., M.P.
Henry Morris, Esq.
Sir Henry Muggeridge, Ald.
Alfred Wilson, Esq.

Matthew Marshall, jun., Esq., Manager.

And one hundred and three Proprietors.

The following Report was read by the Secretary:—

The Deed of Settlement of the Bank contemplates one ordinary General Meeting annually, which the Proprietors have already determined shall be held after the close of the financial period, ending on the 30th of June in each year; but your Directors, considering recent circumstances, have thought it desirable to call the Proprietors together on the present occasion of the declaration of a Dividend, believing that opportunities for intercourse between Directors and Shareholders should be encouraged, as conducive to mutual confidence.

The account of Liabilities and Assets, as vouched by the Auditors, shews a balance standing to credit of "Profit and Loss," on the 31st December last, of 16,904*l.* 9*s.* 11*d.*, after payment of the sum of 20,238*l.* 12*s.* to customers for interest on their balances. The Directors, having fully considered the provision to be made for bad and doubtful debts and other contingencies, have decided to declare a Dividend for the half-year at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum, (free of income tax), reserving a complete settlement of profit and loss until after the 30th of June next, as originally determined.

It will be seen that the profits for the past half-year have not been proportionate to the business acquired, and it should be stated in explanation, that during that period the Directors, as administering the affairs of a Bank so recently established, have felt it their duty to make sacrifices to security at the expense of temporary profit, by keeping in hand ample available funds, and by the realisation of securities at a depreciation, acting under the conviction, that during a period of monetary pressure and general mistrust, they by such a course best consulted the interests of the Proprietors, and laid the surest basis for future prosperity.

Notwithstanding the operation of exceptional circumstances upon immediate profit, the Bank has since the date of the last Report advanced steadily, and without intermission, in the acquisition of business. Current accounts in particular, which are the chief source of profit, have increased 33 per cent. in number, and 29 per cent. in amount of balances; and the Directors are fully justified in asserting that the progress of the undertaking has been substantial, and that its prospects are highly satisfactory.

The building expenses have been slightly augmented by the purchase of the lease and adaptation of the premises adjoining the Charing-cross Branch, a step rendered necessary by the rapidly increasing business of that establishment. On the other hand, the Directors have the satisfaction to report that they have made arrangements with respect to that portion of the premises in the City not required for business purposes, upon advantageous terms.

The Bank was admitted to the facilities of the Clearing-house on the 1st October last.

Your Directors again acknowledge with satisfaction the support they have received from the Shareholders in the introduction of business, and they rely with confidence on their continued co-operation to maintain and improve the important position which the Bank now occupies.

Examined and approved, Jan. 20, 1857.

The Report having been read—

It was moved by the Chairman, seconded by the Vice-Chairman, and resolved unanimously,

That the Report now read be received and printed, and a copy sent to each proprietor.

The Chairman announced that the dividend would be payable on Monday, the 2nd February, at the Head Office in Threadneedle-street.

It was moved by Henry Nicholson, Esq., seconded by W. G. B. Gunton, Esq., and resolved unanimously,

That the thanks of the Proprietors, together with the expression of their entire confidence, be tendered to the Board of Directors, the Manager, and officers of the Bank.

Resolved unanimously—That the thanks of this Meeting be given to Sir John Villiers Shelley, Bart., M.P., for his able and courteous conduct in the Chair.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 7, 1857.

OUR remarks in a former number upon the doctrine of the Lord Chancellor in Scales v. Maude, (6 De G., Mac., & G. 43; 1 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1147), viz. "that a mere declaration of trust by the owner of property in favour of a volunteer is inoperative, and that the Court will not interfere in such a trust," has elicited letters from two correspondents, which will be found printed in another part of this number. With regard to the first of these letters, it will be seen that the learned correspondent cites numerous recent authorities to shew that the dictum of the Lord Chancellor in that case is wholly untenable. Certainly the opinions of Sir J. Romilly, M. R., in Beech v. Keep, (18 Beav. 285; 18 Jur., part 1, p. 972); of Sir J. Stuart, V. C., in Scales v. Maude, (1 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 535); and of Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, L. J., in Kekewich v. Manning, (1 De G., Mac., & G. 189), are in favour of the decision and doctrine of Lord Eldon in Ex parte Pye—Ex parte Dubost, (18 Ves. 140); but we cannot include Lord Cranworth among the number of those who have taken a view adverse to the doctrine he has recently laid down in Scales v. Maude; for although his Lordship was sitting as junior Lord Justice with Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, L. J., when Kekewich v. Manning (1 De G., Mac., & G. 189) was decided, we can scarcely by implication assume that Lord Cranworth in that case meant to do otherwise than give a general assent to the result of the judgment, rather than to adopt precisely all the propositions there enumerated. The learned writer also suggests that probably all the reporters misapprehended his Lordship's expressions.

Now, on referring to the different reports of the case, it appears that all the reporters substantially agree in attributing to his Lordship the dictum of which we complain. (See Weekly Rep. 1855-6, 109; 26 Law T. 131; 25 L. J., Ch., 433). And this universal concurrence amongst the reporters is a strong reason for believing that his Lordship actually said what he has been reported to have said; and the fact that the dictum complained of occupies a prominent place in the marginal note of the authorised report, and which, if submitted to his Lordship, (as is supposed to be generally the case with the authorised reports previous to publication), could not possibly have escaped his observation, compels us to arrive at the conclusion that his Lordship both said and meant to say what has been attributed to him by all the reporters.

The learned conveyancer by whom the second letter is written seems rather inclined to support the Lord Chancellor's opinion, or at all events considers that more extensive discussion is necessary before the doubts arising upon it can be considered as set at rest. He appears to think "that the leading case of Ex parte Pye (18 Ves. 140) was decided upon the ground that there was a complete transfer of the legal ownership;" and he refers to Cotteen v. Missing, (1 Mad. 185); Ellison v. Ellison, (6 Ves. 662); Pulvertoft v. Pulvertoft, (18 Ves. 99); Colman v. Sarrel, (1 Ves. jun. 54); Edwards v. Jones, (1 My. & C. 237); and Jefferys v. Jefferys, (Cr. & Ph. 141), as either confirming or not being inconsistent with his views.

With deference to the learned writer, we think that he has not taken a correct view of the grounds of the decision of Lord Eldon in Ex parte Pye—Ex parte Dubost, (18 Ves. 140). In that case the testator, M., wrote a letter to Dubost in Paris, authorising him to purchase in France an annuity of 100*l.* for M. G. for her life, and to draw upon him for 1500*l.* on account of such purchase. Dubost purchased the annuity; but as M. G. was married and deranged, he did so in the name of M. Afterwards, on the 10th June, 1808, M. sent to Dubost, at his desire, a power of attorney, authorising him to transfer to M. G. the annuity. M. died in June, 1809, and his death became known to Dubost in November, 1809. Dubost had, however, on the 21st October, 1809, in ignorance of M.'s death, acted upon the power of attorney, and transferred the annuity to M. G. In support of the gift of the annuity to M. G. it was argued, first, upon the finding of the Master, that according to the law of France, if an attorney be ignorant of the death of the person who has given the power of attorney, whatever he has done while ignorant of such death is valid, and that consequently there was a complete legal transfer of the annuity; and, secondly, assuming that there had been no legal transfer of the annuity, there had been a sufficient declaration of trust on the part of M., and such as a Court of equity would enforce. Now, it is clear that Lord Eldon determined the case upon the second point solely. "The question," said his Lordship, "involves not only the construction of the French law, and the point whether it has been sufficiently investigated, but further, whether the power of attorney amounts here to a declaration of trust. It is clear that this Court will not assist a volunteer; yet if the act is completed, though voluntary, the Court will act upon it. It has been decided, that upon an agreement to transfer stock this Court will not interpose; but if the party had declared himself to be the trustee of that stock, it becomes the property of the cestui que trust, without more, and the Court will act upon it." On a subsequent day, having taken time to consider the question, his Lordship said, "With regard to the French annuity, the Master has stated his opinion as to the French law, perhaps without sufficient authority, or sufficient inquiry into the effect of it as applicable to the precise circumstances of this case; but it is not necessary to pursue that, as, upon the documents before me, it does appear that though, in one sense, this may be represented as the testator's personal estate, yet he has committed to writing what appears to me a sufficient declaration that he held this part of the estate in trust for the annuitant."

It seems to us, therefore, to be clear that Lord Eldon decided this question, not upon the ground of there having been a transfer of the annuity to the donee, but solely upon the ground that the donor had declared himself to be a trustee of it for her; and deciding it upon the latter ground, it was, as he observed, "not necessary to pursue" the question, how far the transfer was valid or not.

With regard to the cases of Colman v. Sarrel, Ellison v. Ellison, and Pulvertoft v. Pulvertoft, they might at first sight appear to confine the power of the Court of Chancery to the enforcing of voluntary trusts in those cases where there has been an actual transfer of the subject-matter of the gift; but on further examination they are clearly consistent with the doctrine and decision of Lord Eldon in Ex parte Pye—Ex parte Dubost. In Colman v. Sarrel, (1 Ves. jun. 50), where stock had been assigned by a deed in trust for A. and her children as she should appoint, with a covenant that the donor would pay the dividends and interest to the children as A. should appoint, Lord Thurlow said—"Where a deed is not sufficient, in truth, to pass the estate out of the hands of the conveyer, but the party must come into equity, the Court has never yet executed a voluntary agreement. To do so would be to make him who does not sufficiently convey, and his executors after his death, trustees for the person to whom he has so defectively conveyed; and there is no case where a Court of equity has ever done that. Whenever you come into equity to raise an interest by way of trust, you must have a valuable, or at least a meretorious, consideration."

Now, it will be observed, in this case the question was, whether equity would carry into effect an imperfect assignment, or covenant to transfer, and not whether it would carry into effect a trust declared by the donor himself; and Lord Thurlow, in cautious language, does not suggest that the Court will not execute a trust when it has been declared or raised by the donor himself, but that the Court will not take upon itself, in the case of a mere imperfect conveyance or agreement, to raise a trust for a volunteer.

The distinction taken by Lord Eldon in Ellison v. Ellison (6 Ves. 662) is merely founded upon Colman v. Sarrel. "If," said his Lordship, "you want the assistance of the Court to constitute you cestui que trust, and the instrument is voluntary, you shall not have that assistance for the purpose of constituting you cestui que trust, as upon a covenant to transfer stock, &c. If it rest in covenant, and is purely voluntary, this Court will not execute that voluntary covenant; but if the party has completely transferred stock, &c., though it is voluntary, yet, the legal conveyance being effectually made, the equitable interest will be enforced by this Court." The same remark applies to what Lord Eldon says in Pulvertoft v. Pulvertoft, (18 Ves. 99), where he observes, that "where an actual trust is created the Court takes jurisdiction." It is true that he there gives, as an instance of an actual trust, the case of an actual transfer, but he does not limit an actual trust to the case of an actual transfer. What his Lordship means by an actual trust in former cases will be best explained by what he says in Ex parte Pye—Ex parte Dubost, where the occasion arose, which had not arisen in the previous cases, for a more complete definition, and for a further illustration of the subject.

In Cotteen v. Missing, (1 Mad. 176), Sir T. Plumer, V. C., decided against the gift, upon the ground that "certain letters did not, as in Ex parte Pye—Ex parte Dubost, amount to a declaration of trust," in which case, he observed, "the gift was complete." (See pp. 184, 185).

The remark of Lord Cottenham in Jefferys v. Jefferys (Cr. & Ph. 141) appears to have little bearing upon the subject. The real question in all these cases is, whether by a complete act a trust has been created, and the relation of trustee and cestui que trust constituted between the parties. One mode, doubtless, of doing so is by an actual transfer of property to trustees for volunteers. Another mode is by the donor declaring himself to be a trustee for them. In each case equally a Court of equity is not called upon to do anything to raise a trust; each is of itself perfect already. That such was

Lord Eldon's opinion in Ex parte Pye—Ex parte Dubost, and that it is nowhere contradicted in other cases decided by him, is, as we think we have shewn, abundantly clear; and the great majority of subsequent equity judges appear to agree with him.

The principles laid down by Lord Eldon in Ex parte Pye—Ex parte Dubost were certainly approved of by Sir J. Wigram, V. C., than whom a more accurate and painstaking judge never sat upon the bench. His Honor, in the well-considered case of Meek v. Kettlewell, (1 Hare, 469), observes, with reference to this question, "that where a trust is actually created in favour of a volunteer, a Court of equity will enforce its execution, although it will not lend its aid to enforce a voluntary agreement. And according to Lord Eldon's decision in Ex parte Pye—Ex parte Dubost, a party may so constitute himself a trustee that a Court of equity will execute the trust in favour of a volunteer." And after citing the passage from Ex parte Pye—Ex parte Dubost which we have before given, and stating that the cases of Colman v. Sarrel, Ellison v. Ellison, and Pulvertoft v. Pulvertoft might not go further than to establish, "that where the legal interest in property is transferred or acquired in pursuance and in execution of an antecedent agreement or direction leading the uses or trusts of that property, or as part of the transactions creating the trust, the Court will execute the trust, though voluntary," his Honor added, "There does not, however, appear to be any reason why the doctrine of the Court should be so confined, provided the trust is actually created, and the relation of trustee and cestui que trust established between the parties. The language of Lord Eldon in the passage I have cited is not so limited; and since the late cases of Wheatley v. Purr (1 Kee. 551) and Coltman v. Pattrick, (2 Kee. 123), I conclude that Lord Langdale takes a similar view of the subject. The question must be simply this—whether the relation of trustee and cestui que trust has been actually established or not."

We do not for a moment contend, that where there has been a mere agreement, or an ineffectual attempt by the donor to transfer property to volunteers, or trustees for them, (not amounting, as in Ex parte Pye—Ex parte Dubost, to a declaration of trust), a Court of equity can interfere. But between such cases, and cases where the donor declares himself to be a trustee, there is a clear and well-defined distinction, which, even if it were not well founded, it is dangerous to shake, after it has been so long established and so frequently acted upon.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

Sir,—In your number of Jan. 17 (p. 3) the authority of several eminent judges is adduced for the purpose of shewing that a dictum ascribed to Lord Cranworth in the report of Scales v. Maude, (6 De G., Mac., & G. 43; 1 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1147), viz. "Mere declaration of trust by the owner of property in favour of a volunteer is inoperative, and this Court will not interfere in such a trust," is wholly untenable. I beg to subjoin a few very recent authorities, including that of Lord Cranworth himself, in favour of your argument. Probably all the reporters misapprehended his Lordship's expressions in Scales v. Maude.

Your obedient servant,

W.

In Kekewich v. Manning, (1 De G., Mac., & G. 189), Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, L. J., remarked—"But whatever rule there may be against volunteers, it does not apply to the case of one, who in the language of this Court is termed a cestui que trust, claiming against his trustee; for that which is considered by this jurisdiction a trust may certainly be created gratuitously: so that the absence of consideration for its creation is in general absolutely immaterial." And p. 195—"Having, with my learned brother's concurrence, made these remarks on his behalf as well as my own, I proceed" &c. Lord Cranworth was then the junior Lord Justice.

In Beech v. Keep, (18 Jur., part 1, p. 972; 18 Beav. 285), Sir J. Romilly, M. R., said—"If a person possessed of stock execute a declaration of trust in favour of a volunteer, he would, I apprehend, clearly constitute himself a trustee for the volunteer, and equity would execute the trust."

In Scales v. Maude, (1 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 535), Sir J. Stuart, V. C., said—"If there be a complete and perfect declaration of trust, in plain and distinct words, by a party entitled to declare it, so as to have an immediate effect as a declaration of trust, when that occurs the Court is bound to give it effect."

In Donaldson v. Donaldson, (1 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 12), Sir W. P. Wood, V. C., said—"Wherever there is a complete declaration of trust by a party of any stock or chose in action which is invested in his own name, the Court will interfere to assist the parties interested under that declaration in carrying it into effect."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

Sir,—In your number of this day appears a leading article on the interesting subject of voluntary trusts; and I submit that the subject requires a much more extensive discussion in your valuable periodical, whereby the doubts arising upon it may be in some measure, if not altogether, set at rest. Time will not permit me to enter into the discussion properly myself; but I would submit for your consideration, and that of your readers, that the leading case of Ex parte Pye, (18 Ves. 140), quoted in the article in question, was decided upon the ground that there was a complete transfer of the legal ownership, as appears from the case itself, and the subsequent case of Cotteen v. Missing, (1 Mad. 185); and that Lord Eldon's observations in Ex parte Pye, quoted in the article, had nothing to do with the facts, and must be taken in connexion with observations from him of a similar character in Ellison v. Ellison (6 Ves. 662) and Pulvertoft v. Pulvertoft, (18 Ves. 99), founded on Colman v. Sarrel, (1 Ves. jun. 54), in all which, I submit, legal creation of the trust is clearly intended. I submit also that Lord Cottenham's observations in Edwards v. Jones, (1 My. & C. 237), referred to in the article, are quite consistent with this view; or, at least, must be taken in connexion with his observations in Jefferys v. Jefferys, (Cr. & Ph. 141), which seem to me quite to confirm that view. The recent case of Trimmer v. Danby (before Sir R. T. Kindersley, V. C.) should also be considered. The fact is, the matter requires thorough consideration upon principle.

I remain, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
A Conveyancing Barrister.

Lincoln's Inn, Jan. 17, 1857.

REGULÆ GENERALES.

ORDER OF COURT.—Jan. 30, 1857.

WHEREAS of late years various alterations have taken place in the practice and procedure of the Court of Chancery, whereby certain of the fees heretofore allowed to the solicitors of the Court have ceased, and others of such fees have become inapplicable to the duties which the solicitors have to perform, and it is desirable that a new and revised list of fees should be made:

Now, upon consideration thereof,

The Right Hon. ROBERT MONSEY Lord CRANWORTH, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, with the advice and assistance of the Right Hon. Sir JAMES LEWIS KNIGHT BRUCE and the Right Hon. Sir GEORGE JAMES TURNER, the Lords Justices of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, the Hon. the Vice-Chancellor Sir RICHARD TORIN KINDERSLEY, the Hon. the Vice-Chancellor Sir JOHN STUART, and the Hon. the Vice-Chancellor Sir WILLIAM PAGE WOOD, doth order and direct as follows:—

1. The several Orders and parts of Orders following are discharged, so far as regards all costs incurred subsequent to the time when this Order comes into operation:

The Order of the 26th February, 1807, except so much thereof as is mentioned in the Second Schedule hereto.

The Sixth Schedule to the Order of the 26th October, 1842.

The 121st section of the Order of the 8th May, 1845.

So much of the 33rd section of the Order of the 22nd April, 1850, as relates to the fees to be charged by and allowed to solicitors.

The 4th section of the Order of the 7th August, 1852, and the Schedule A. appended to such Order.

The 5th section of the Order of the 23rd October, 1852.

2. Solicitors are to be entitled to charge and be allowed the fees set forth in the column headed "Lower Scale" in the First Schedule hereto, in the several cases following, unless the Court shall make order to the contrary; that is to say—

First, in all suits by creditors, legatees, (whether specific, pecuniary, or residuary), devisees, (whether in trust or otherwise), heirs at law or next of kin, in which the personal or real, or personal and real estate for or against or in respect of which, or for an account or administration of which, the demand may be made, shall be under the amount or value of 1000*l*.

Secondly, in all suits for the execution of trusts in which the trust estate or fund shall be under the amount or value of 1000*l*.

Thirdly, in all suits for foreclosure or redemption, or for enforcing any charge or lien, in which the mortgage whereon the suit is founded, or the charge or lien sought to be enforced, shall be under the amount or value of 1000*l*.

Fourthly, in all suits for specific performance, in which the purchase money or consideration shall be under the amount or value of 1000*l*.

Fifthly, in all proceedings under the Trustees Relief Acts, or under the Trustee Acts, or under any of such acts, in which the trust estate or fund to which the proceeding relates shall be under the amount or value of 1000*l*.

Sixthly, in all proceedings relating to the guardianship or maintenance of infants, in which the property of the infant shall be under the amount or value of 1000*l*.

Seventhly, in all proceedings by special case, and in all proceedings relating to funds carried to separate accounts, and in all proceedings under any railway or private act of Parliament, or under any other statutory or summary jurisdiction, and generally in all other cases where the estate or fund to be dealt with shall be under the amount or value of 1000*l*.

3. In all other cases solicitors are to be entitled to charge and be allowed the fees set forth in the column headed "Higher Scale" in the First Schedule hereto, unless the Court shall make order to the contrary as to all or any of the parties.

4. The fees of court, now collected by means of stamps, are to be reduced and varied as set forth in the Third Schedule hereto.

The fees set forth in the column headed "Lower Scale" in the Third Schedule hereto are to be paid in all cases in which the Lower Scale of fees is to be charged by and allowed to solicitors, under the provisions of the 2nd section of this Order; and the fees of court set forth in the column headed "Higher Scale" in the Third Schedule hereto are to be paid in all other cases.

The solicitor or party instituting any proceeding in respect of which he claims to pay the fees of court according to the Lower Scale is to file with the Clerk of Records and Writs a certificate in the form hereunder set forth, of which certificate the Clerk of Records and Writs is, at the request of any solicitor, or any party acting in person, in the suit or matter, to mark a copy.

On production of such copy of the certificate, the officers of the court are to receive and file all proceedings in the suit or matter bearing stamps according to the Lower Scale.

In any case certified for the Lower Scale of court fees, in which it shall happen that the solicitor shall become entitled to charge and be allowed according to the Higher Scale of solicitors' fees, the deficiency in the fees of court is to be made good.

In any case in which the fees of court have been paid upon the Higher Scale, and in which it shall happen that the solicitor shall become entitled to charge and be allowed only according to the Lower Scale of solicitors' fees, the excess of fees of court so paid may be allowed upon the taxation of costs, if the circumstances of the case shall, in the judgment of the Taxing Master, justify such allowance.

This Order is to come into operation on the 1st February, 1857.

(Title of cause or matter).

I hereby certify, that, to the best of my judgment and belief, the Lower Scale of fees of court is applicable to this case. Dated &c.

A. B., Solicitor for ——.

RICHD. T. KINDERSLEY, V. C.
JOHN STUART, V. C.

Romilly, Master of the Rolls, the Right Hon. Sir James Lewis Knight Bruce and the Right Hon. Sir George James Turner, the Lords Justices of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, the Hon. the Vice-Chancellor Sir Richard Torin Kindersley, the Hon. the Vice-Chancellor Sir John Stuart, and the Hon. the Vice-Chancellor Sir William Page Wood, both hereby, in pursuance of the act passed in the session of Parliament holden in the fifth and sixth years of the reign of her present Majesty, intituled "An Act for abolishing certain Offices in the High Court of Chancery in England," and in pursuance and execution of all other powers enabling him in that behalf, order and direct—

That in lieu of the Order numbered 22, comprised in the General Order of the 26th October, 1842, the following order be substituted; that is to say—

Service of all writs, notices, summonses, orders, warrants, rules, documents, and other proceedings not requiring personal service upon the party to be affected thereby, shall be made before seven o'clock in the evening, except on Saturdays, when it shall be made before two o'clock in the afternoon, and if made after seven o'clock in the evening on any day except Saturdays, the service shall be deemed as made on the following day, and if made after two o'clock in the afternoon on Saturday, the service shall be deemed as made on the following Monday.

This Order is to come into operation on the 10th February, 1857.

STARKIE'S LAW OF EVIDENCE.—New Edition.

A PRACTICAL TREATISE of the LAW of EVIDENCE. By THOMAS STARKIE, Esq. Fourth Edition, with very considerable alterations and additions; incorporating the Statutes and reported Cases to the time of publication. By G. M. DOWDESWELL and J. G. MALCOLM, Esqrs., Barristers at Law. Just published, in 1 vol. royal 8vo., price 1*l.* 16*s.* cloth.

"Fortunately for the Profession, the new edition has been intrusted to gentlemen, of whom one is well known, not only as a ripe and accomplished lawyer, (doctrinâ maüidus), but as a judicious editor, knowing how to withhold as well as how to apply his hand. Amid the present plague of reports mere industry is not sufficient to qualify even a second-rate editor. . . . . It is evident that the editors have not been blinded by their respect for the author, but have altered, corrected, and amended wherever they have seen occasion. Such a course could not be pursued safely upon a small stock of learning or of judgment; and in our opinion it has been pursued, not only with safety, but with manifest advantage to the book; so that the fourth edition of Starkie is to the existing law what the first edition was to the law in 1824. . . . . We wish we had some means of identifying Mr. Malcolm's portions of the work. As it is, being hitherto unknown in authorship, he must be content with the praise of having borne a part where all was good."—Jurist.

"It is also the only work of which a new edition has been brought out at such a time as to render it possible that it should apply to practice, with any degree of consideration and accuracy, the modern changes in the law. . . . . We think the editors will have gone far towards restoring the admirable work of Mr. Starkie to its original character of the best work on the law of evidence which has yet been produced."—Legal Observer.

CAUTION.—TO TRADESMEN, MERCHANTS, SHIPPERS, OUTFITTERS, &c.

WHEREAS it has lately come to my knowledge that some unprincipled person or persons have for some time past been imposing upon the public, by selling to the Trade and others a spurious article under the name of BOND'S PERMANENT MARKING INK: this is to give Notice, that I am the original and sole Proprietor and Manufacturer of the said Article, and do not employ any traveller, or authorise any persons to represent themselves as coming from my establishment, for the purpose of selling the said Ink. This Caution is published by me to prevent further imposition upon the public, and serious injury to myself.

E. R. BOND, Sole Executrix and Widow of the late John Bond, 28, Long-lane, West Smithfield, London.

 To avoid disappointment from the substitution of counterfeits, be careful to ask for the genuine Bond's Permanent Marking Ink; and further to distinguish it, observe that NO SIXPENNY SIZE is or has at any time been prepared by him, the Inventor and Proprietor.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 14, 1857.

LORD ST. LEONARDS, in his work on Powers, makes the following observations with respect to the effect of the exercise of a power of revocation reserved, but alone, and uncoupled with any power of new appointment, in a deed or other instrument inter vivos executing a power. He says, "If the original power be a general primary one, and the estate be settled only in default of and until its execution, a new appointment, with a power of revocation only, and a subsequent exercise of that power, would, it is apprehended, restore the original settlement, and with it the general power of appointment, which would effect the intention; for in such a case the original power of appointment in its creation overrides all the other uses, and comes in lieu of the fee. It cannot be treated as a mere power to defeat a settlement, for it is itself the immediate and leading object of the settlement. . . . . But where, on the contrary, the estate is at once settled to uses in strict settlement, with a power of revocation, and that power is afterwards executed by a new limitation, and a power of revocation only reserved, and the latter power is then exercised, in that case the last revocation would restore the original settlement, but not, it should seem, the original power of revocation." The reason of the above distinction is not at the first view quite apparent. The argument from implied intention is surely strained somewhat tightly, by maintaining that the form of the original settlement affords any more evidence in the one case than in the other of an intention, that by the exercise of the power of revocation reserved in the last deed the original settlement should be restored, either with or without the powers therein contained. But the doctrine thus laid down results from a consideration of what the cases then decided had established as law, and apparently also from a feeling that those decisions had carried the law far enough in the direction to which they tended. It had been held, first, that a power to revoke in an original instrument does authorise a new appointment; secondly, in principle, that an instrument exercising a power must expressly reserve the powers intended to be retained, (Hele v. Bond, 2 Sugd. Pow., App., 5), and consequently that a power of revocation reserved in such an instrument does not include a power to limit new uses; and, thirdly, that where uses are at once limited by a settlement containing a power of revocation and new appointment, or, what would amount to the same thing, a power of revocation only, but the deed executing the power reserves only a power of revocation, then the exercise of such last-mentioned power restores the original settlement, but discharged of the powers therein contained. (Ward v. Lenthall, 2 Keb. 269). Here Lord St. Leonards made a stand, and distinguished the case where the estate was settled only in default of execution of the original power, which in that case he denominated a general primary power—an expression, by the way, as the context shews, not intended to exclude particular powers, but applying to powers both general and particular, in the usual signification of these terms. This doctrine, however, has since been much considered in the two important cases of Montagu v. Kater (8 Exch. 507) and Evans v. Saun- ders—Evans v. Evans, (1 Drew. 415, 664; 24 L. J., Ch., 609; 17 Jur., part 1, p. 338); and though no direct decision has been come to upon the point, a disposition has been shewn to abolish the distinction; Sir R. T. Kindersley, V. C., inclining to hold the power in the original settlement destroyed, even in the case where the estate is originally limited only in default of execution of the power; the Lords Justices, on the other hand, and perhaps also the Court of Exchequer, inclining to restrain the doctrine which would destroy the powers in the original settlement, even in the case where the estate is at once limited to uses in strict settlement, or, at any rate, not to extend it to any case where not absolutely obliged so to do by the necessity of strictly adhering to precedent in all points of law once established, upon which the titles to estates may depend. It may be useful, therefore, to point out what was actually decided in the cases above mentioned, and the precise grounds upon which those decisions proceeded. The case of Montagu v. Kater, so far as material, is as follows:—Landed estates were settled to the use of A. for life, remainder to the use of B. for life, remainder to the use of the children of A. and B. as A. and B. should by any deed or writing jointly appoint; and in default of such joint appointment, as the survivor should by deed or will appoint; and in default of such appointment, to the use of trustees, upon certain trusts, which in the events which happened would have been for the benefit of the eldest son of A. and B. A. and B. had two sons. A. and B., in pursuance of the power in the settlement, appointed the premises, subject to their own life estates, to the use of their youngest son in fee, reserving a joint power of revocation and new appointment. A. and B. afterwards exercised the joint power of revocation, but made no new appointment. B. died, and after B.'s death, A., in exercise of the separate power given to the survivor by the original settlement, appointed the premises by will to his youngest son in fee. It was held that this latter appointment was valid, on the ground, that by the revocation alone of the joint appointment the original settlement was entirely restored; and Alderson, B., in delivering the judgment of the Court, after quoting the words of Lord St. Leonards as to a general primary power, said—"By the execution of the joint power the estate was limited to the defendant" (the youngest son) "in fee. The revocation of that appointment, also jointly made, revived the original power of joint appointment, and with it the dependent power of appointment by the survivor in case of default. The case then stands exactly as if the first joint appointment had never been made. Then, if so, the subsequent non-exercise of that subsisting joint power was clearly a default in executing such joint power. The consequence is, that in that event the power came to the survivor." It will be observed that the distinction between this case and those put by Lord St. Leonards is, that here the instrument executing the joint power of appointment reserved a power of new appointment, as well as a power of revocation; but it will also be observed that the learned Barons applied the language of Lord St. Leonards as to a general primary power to this case, where a power of new appointment was reserved, together with a power of revocation, as well as to the case put by him, and which he has said (2 Sugd. Pow. 458) was the only case where the question could arise, namely, where a power of revocation only was reserved; though at the same time it was evidently with reluctance that the Court entertained the notion that the powers in the original settlement could in any case be presumed to have been destroyed. The second case above referred to was, so far as material, as follows:—By settlement in 1794 estates were limited to A. for life, remainder as she should by deed or will appoint. In 1830, A., by deed, appointed the fee in pursuance of the power, reserving powers of revocation and new appointment exerciseable only by deed. In 1833, A., by deed, in exercise of the power in the deed of 1830, revoked the uses limited by that deed, and newly appointed the fee, again reserving powers of revocation and new appointment exerciseable only by deed. In 1835, A., by deed, revoked the uses limited by the deed of 1833, and newly appointed the fee, again reserving a power of revocation and new appointment exerciseable only by deed. In 1836, A. revoked the uses limited by the deed of 1835, but made no new appointment. By her will, executed in 1848, and purporting to be made in exercise of the power reserved by the settlement of 1794, A. devised the estate to trustees upon trusts for sale. The question was, whether the power reserved to A. by the settlement of 1794, to appoint by will, was subsisting at the time when A. purported to exercise that power by her will. Sir R. T. Kindersley, V.C., assumed that the original power contained in the settlement of 1794 to appoint by deed or will had come to an end, and held that it had not been restored, and therefore that the power to appoint by will (it being admitted on all hands that the power to appoint by deed or will was one power, though the mode of its execution was alternative) was not subsisting at the time of its supposed execution. Sir G. J. Turner, L. J., held that the power contained in the original settlement to appoint by deed or will had never come to an end, and consequently that the power to appoint by will was subsisting at that time. "No act," said his Lordship, "had been done to affect the power to appoint by deed or will contained in the original settlement, unless it had been exhausted by the several deeds of appointment, or destroyed by the new powers of appointment created by those deeds." With respect to the first point, his Lordship's opinion was, that although uses had been from time to time appointed, exhausting the fee, those uses had at all times been revocable, and that such defeasible uses could not exhaust the original power. This language, if taken generally, appears quite opposed to the doctrine of Lord St. Leonards; but it must be observed, that here the original power was, in the language of Lord St. Leonards, a general primary power; and further, that this case also is distinguishable from those put by him, inasmuch as here, the deed, reserving the power of revocation last exercised, reserved also a power of new appointment—a distinction which Sir G. J. Turner, L. J., in his judgment expressly pointed out. With respect to the second point, as to whether the new powers to appoint by deed, contained in the several deeds of appointment, had destroyed the original power to appoint by deed or will, his Lordship's opinion was, that the question must be governed by the intention; that very clear evidence of intention would be necessary, inasmuch as the substitution of the less extensive power would be in derogation of an existing right; and that there was no such evidence in the case before him as would justify such a conclusion. Such is the result of the law upon the principal point under discussion. A further question, however, arose in the case of Evans v. Saunders, as to whether the revocation by the deed of 1836 of the uses declared by the deed of 1835 might not have operated to restore the uses declared by the deed of 1833, with respect to which the Lords Justices appear to have been divided in opinion. But the consideration of this, and of some other important points suggested by the observations of the learned judges in these cases, we are compelled to reserve for a subsequent occasion.

The present week has been fruitful in parliamentary bills of peculiar interest to lawyers. We offer to our readers a summary of them, which may be useful to those who have read the debates at length, in reminding them of the main points which they present, and also to those who have not read them, in saving the time and trouble required for perusing many columns of a newspaper or pages of Hansard.

First in order, Lord Brougham has introduced a bill for preventing vexatious actions by persons who are unable to pay the costs in the event of their being unsuccessful. His Lordship proposes that a judge shall have a discretionary power to hear a case on its merits, and, having regard to the circumstances and nature of the action, to order proceedings to be stayed until security be given for the costs.

Sir George Grey has brought in a bill to amend the Penal Servitude Act, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99. The effect of the proposed amendments is to abolish transportation as a substantive sentence, and to substitute penal servitude in all cases. Sentences of penal servitude are rendered co-extensive in point of time with those of transportation, in lieu of which they are imposed. The first portion of the sentence is to be passed in prison at home. Irreclaimable convicts are to be imprisoned for life. Of reclaimable convicts, as many as can advantageously be so disposed of will be sent to Western Australia. There is no intention of founding any new penal settlement beyond sea.

The Lord Chancellor's bill relating to the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts proposes to constitute one Court of Probate, which is to be a temporal and not an ecclesiastical court, and to be established in London for the mere purpose of registering wills and of directing in what courts any questions which may arise as to their validity shall be tried. District courts are to be continued for the purpose of proving wills where the personal estate is sworn under 1500*l.* The Court of Probate in London is to be presided over by one of the Vice-Chancellors. The exclusive privileges of the proctors are to be retained for the registration of wills, but the court is to be thrown open to practitioners in the common-law courts for other business, which just amounts to nothing, inasmuch as the contentious jurisdiction of the Court is to be abolished, and, beyond registering wills, it will have simply the office of laying the venue for the trial of issues concerning their validity. Where the personal estate is sworn under 200*l.* county courts are to have jurisdiction to determine whether wills are valid or not. As to the matrimonial jurisdiction, it is proposed (as we understand the measure) that a separate tribunal shall be established for the purpose of exercising it, and that if a married woman be deserted by her husband without lawful excuse for three years, she may obtain a decree of separation, which will enable her thenceforth to be mistress of her own property. If they come together again, she is to have the same power of making a settlement out of her earnings in the interval as she had before marriage. In other cases of separation by deed, she is to have separate control over her after-acquired property. All the other Lords who took part in the discussion objected to the Lord Chancellor's measure so far as it relates to the above matters, viz. the testamentary and matrimonial jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts. With regard to church discipline, it is provided that a bishop may at any time file articles in his own court in a simple form against an offending clergyman, and the same course may be taken (except in the case of merely doctrinal offences) by any voluntary promoter. If the charge be admitted, the bishop, assisted by the chancellor or vicar-general, will pronounce sentence; if denied, a jury of five persons, clergymen and laymen, are to decide the questions of fact. An appeal will lie to the Court of Arches, and thence to the Privy Council.

The second report of the Statute-law Commission has been referred to a select committee, in order to consider the propositions in that report for the adoption of means to improve the manner and language of current legislation. The Lord Chancellor stated the effect of those propositions to be, that an officer should be appointed, with a sufficient staff, (the extent of that staff being matter of experiment), whose duty it would be to attend to all bills that were referred to him; to report exactly what was the existing state of the law on the subject to which it related, and what alteration it would effect in the existing law; to examine all bills after they had passed through committee, and report to the House the effect of the alterations which might have been made, so that Parliament might be guided in its decisions as to whether those bills should pass or not. "The mistakes," his Lordship added, "made in legislation from the want of such supervision were positively discreditable. In the very last session of Parliament a County Court Act was passed in which it was provided that certain judges should receive the salaries placed opposite their names in the schedule; but in the schedule there were two judges opposite whose names no salaries were put at all. In the same session an act was passed for improving the Scotch bankruptcy law, in which certain proceedings were to be adopted in the form set forth in the schedule; but there was no schedule in the act. In 1850 an act was passed which was meant to come into force on a certain day after next Trinity Term; but it happened to be Trinity Term when it passed, so that the act could not come into operation till the following year, and a bill was necessary to set it right. Besides blunders like these, there was a custom of introducing clauses into a bill which had no connexion whatever with its object. The report of the commissioners recommended that bills should be classed, so that those which laid down permanent rules of law should be separated from those of a local or private character; that they again should be subdivided into statutes applying to England, Ireland, Scotland, and the colonies, and thus our legislation kept from becoming a confused mass which it was almost impossible to comprehend."

Lord Campbell said that their bungling mode of legislation had brought discredit on legislative assemblies. Questions relating to the common law which were brought before the Court of Queen's Bench were very soon settled; but those which turned upon the statute law—the settlement of the poor, or the statutes relating to highways and prisons—occasioned the Court great trouble and inconvenience, in consequence of the deplorable laxity with which the different acts were framed.

In the House of Commons, upon the same subject being discussed, Lord Palmerston referred to the act of Parliament which made a special provision for the event of Good Friday falling on a Sunday; and Mr. J. G. Phillimore said that specimens of consolidation acts had been laid upon the table, and the most cursory examination shewed them to have been drawn up in a very careless and slovenly manner. The act consolidating the law of treason reproduced the most obsolete provisions, making it treason to kill a judge sitting in Eyre. Enactments relating to the corruption of blood were also referred to as now existing, although they were abolished many years ago. Another of the bills declared the stealing of Exchequer tallies, which were no longer used, punishable as larceny. Nothing could exceed the tautology and confusion in the language of our statutes. The acts drawn by Mr. Deacon Hume for the regulation of the customs were, however, perfect models of brevity and precision, and it was disgraceful that their style was not generally imitated in the rest of our legislation. In illustration of the heterogeneous contents of particular acts disfiguring our statute-book, he quoted the title of the 40 Geo. 2, which was intended to continue several laws for the northern borders of England, to confer certain privileges connected with the conveyance of sugar from our colonies, to deal with the prosecution of offenders, and also to prevent the retailing of wine within the universities. Another statute, comprising a still larger and more motley group of subjects, was intituled "An Act to continue Weirs on the River Thames, to prevent the spread of Distempers among horned Cattle, to make certain Regulations for Attornies and Solicitors, to provide for a more frequent Return to Writs in the County Palatine, to impose Rates on the Inhabitants of the City of London, and to allow Quakers to make Affirmations in lieu of taking Oaths."

The Judgments Execution Bill has been read a second time. Its intention is, that a judgment obtained in England should have the same effect in Ireland and Scotland as in England, and vice versâ.

Kingsford v. Merry has been brought before the House of Commons; but the Vice-President of the Board of Trade, while admitting it was a hard case on the defendant, does not see his way clearly to legislate upon the subject, so as to satisfy the different views and wishes of the mercantile class.

Review.

Steer's Parish Law; being a Digest of the Law relating to the Civil and Ecclesiastical Government of Parishes, Friendly Societies, &c., and the Relief, Settlement, and Removal of the Poor. Third Edition. By Henry John Hodgson, Esq., Barrister at Law.

[Stevens & Norton.]

The period which has elapsed since 1843, when the second edition of this book appeared, has been fruitful in statutes and decisions upon the main subjects to which it is devoted. These accumulated stores have been carefully and skilfully collected, analysed, and arranged in the body of the work by its present editor. In allusion to this part of his labours he says—

"Among the more important additions thus introduced are the statutes relating to the formation of new parishes, the amendment of the Marriage and Registration Acts, and the establishment of a county constabulary throughout England, all of which became law during the last session; while the result of previous legislation will be found in the measures for prohibiting interment in populous places; for the establishment of vestries under the Metropolis Local Management Act; for facilitating the duties of justices of the peace, and protecting them from actions; for the amendment of the laws relating to the relief and removal of the poor, and the procedure consequent thereupon; and for the regulation of friendly societies.

"The provisions of these acts, as well as of such others as have a bearing upon the different heads of parish law, have been fully abstracted, and embodied in the text."

This book is so well known as a valuable compendium of parish law as to require but few comments on our part. It is useful not only to those who are immediately engaged in parochial affairs, of themselves a very numerous and important body, but also as affording information upon subjects interesting to all members of the community, and especially to the legal Profession. Thus, after treating of parishes, it proceeds to the subjects of the church, its officers, rites, and sacraments; dissenters, highways, vestries, justices of the peace and constables, weights and measures, disorderly houses, vagrants, and rates. The remainder of the book is devoted to the poor laws and friendly societies.

The part relating to the poor laws is especially valuable, as it includes the latest decisions, and at the same time digests the vast and difficult body of statute law upon the subject. Under this head the law of settlement and removal is fully discussed.

We make an extract from the work upon the curious error which once prevailed, that a dead body might be arrested for debt:—

"The vulgar notion that a dead body may be arrested for debt, and prevented from being buried, which seems to have been imported from the civil law, has now become obsolete, though Linwood says it at one time prevailed, (Wood's Civil L. 148; Lind. 278); and the funeral of Sir Barnard Turner in 1784, proceeding from London to Hertford, was said to have been stopped by an arrest of his body till his friends entered into engagements for his debts, (1 Burn's Eccl. L. 258 b); and the body of Dryden, the poet, was seized in like manner. But the legality of such a proceeding cannot be supported. By the death of the debtor all his property is vested in others—his heir and personal representatives; he cannot, therefore, satisfy the creditor out of his property; and that his body after death can be no satisfaction seems to be the opinion of the Legislature in the stat. 21 Jac. 1, c. 24, which provides, that if a debtor die in execution, the persons at whose suit he stands charged may sue out new execution against his land and goods. The authority of the case cited by Hyde, C. J., in Quick v. Copleton, (1 Lev. 161; 1 Sid. 242; 1 Keb. 866), in which a woman was holden liable on a promise to pay, in consideration of forbearance to arrest the dead body of her son, was thus contradicted by Lord Ellenborough in Jones v. Ashburnham, (4 East, 460, 465):—'It is impossible to contend that this past forbearance could be a good consideration, for an assumpsit to seize a dead body upon any such pretence would be contra bonos mores, and an extortion on the relatives. It is contrary to every principle of law and moral feeling: such an act is revolting to humanity, and illegal, and therefore a promise extorted by the fear of it could never be valid in law. It might as well be said that a promise in consideration that one would withdraw a pistol from another's breast could be enforced against the party acting under such unlawful terror.'

"Where a gaoler refused to deliver up the body of a prisoner who had died in his custody, unless certain claims against the deceased were satisfied, the Court compelled him to do so by mandamus. (Reg. v. Fox, 2 Q. B. 247)."

We cannot conclude our notice of this book without expressing a hope that in future editions the authorities may be transferred to the foot of each page, instead of disfiguring and breaking the text.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 21, 1857.

THE Courts of Westminster have now solemnly decided that a shareholder in a company cannot get rid of his liability to its creditors by shewing that it was through the fraud of the company he was induced to become a shareholder. These decisions were given with reference to "the thing ironically called the Royal British Bank[*]," and its unfortunate dupes. They will be found reported in our last number, under the names of Henderson v. The Official Manager of the Royal British Bank (3 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 111) and Daniell v. The Same, (Id. 119), and another case in the Court of Common Pleas, reported in our present number. The application was for leave to issue execution against a shareholder by a judgment creditor of the bank, under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 113, s. 10. The proposed answer was, that the shareholder had been induced by fraud to take the shares. He had remained a shareholder for a considerable time, received dividends, and acted in all respects as a shareholder until the bank stopped payment. He then gave notice he was no longer a shareholder, and disaffirmed the contract as far as he could. "This," said Lord Campbell, C. J., delivering judgment, "is an application by a creditor, who, on the faith of a party against whom it is made, that party being a shareholder, and having held himself out as a shareholder, gave credit to the bank by depositing money with it. . . . It would be monstrous if, having become a partner in the bank, and held himself out to the public as a shareholder, and remained such until the bank stopped payment, he could get rid of his liability to the creditors of the bank by saying, 'I am no longer a shareholder; I have been defrauded.' Whether he can say that to other shareholders who were privy to the fraud may be a question. Suppose this were a common partnership, and credit were given to the firm, and judgment were obtained in an action brought against the firm, it would be no answer to the creditor that the partner he sued was induced by the fraud of the other partners to become a member of the firm. That circumstance might be considered as between the partners inter se, but as between the firm and a creditor it is a matter wholly immaterial." It will be observed that this decision does not affect the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in Ireland in the case of The Tipperary Bank, upon which we commented in a former number[*]. There the effect of fraud was considered as between the shareholders themselves, and not as between them and creditors of the bank; and the Master of the Rolls decided that the English shareholders who had been induced to take shares by the fraud of the directors were not liable as contributories under the Winding-up Act.

Upon that occasion we also referred to the case of The Universal Provident Life Insurance Company, ex parte Bell, (June 21, 1856), in which the Master of the Rolls in England held that a person who had been induced by fraud to take shares in an insurance office was not liable as a contributory; and to The Deposit and General Life Insurance Company v. Ayscough, (2 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 812), in which the Court of Queen's Bench, in effect, held that a plea to an action for calls, that the defendant had been induced to become a shareholder by the fraud of the company, and repudiated the contract as soon as he discovered the fraud, would be a good answer.

To these may be added White v. Garden, (10 C. B. 919; 15 Jur., part 1, p. 630), where it was held, that a contract for the sale of goods obtained by fraud on the part of the purchaser was void only at the election of the vendor, and that it was too late to declare such election after the goods had passed into the hands of a bonâ fide purchaser; Ellis v. Schmæck and Another, (5 Bing. 521), in which the facts were, that the defendants had purchased scrip of a mining company originated in fraud, and had attended one meeting of the company, but they never signed the partnership deed, were innocent of the fraud, and transferred their scrip before the plaintiff commenced an action for goods furnished to the company, after the defendants had purchased their scrip, but it was held that they were liable; and Parbury's case, (3 De G. & S. 43), in which the decision was, that sufficient ground was not shewn for excluding an allottee from the list of contributories to a provisionally-registered railway company, that the prospectus contained incorrect and fraudulent statements, in reliance on which he applied for shares, or that the project was never carried into effect, unless it were made to appear that the only other persons interested in the company were the persons who made the fraudulent statements. (See also Ex parte Morgan, in re The Vale of Neath and South Wales Brewery Joint-stock Company, 1 Hall & T. 320). The result of the decisions appears to be, that the shareholder may set up the fraud practised upon him as against those parties by whom the fraud was committed, but not as against innocent parties, whether they be co-shareholders or creditors of the company.

In Davison v. Duncan the Court of Queen's Bench decided (Jan. 23, 1857) that it is no defence to an action for a libel in a newspaper, that the matter complained of is a true account of what passed at a public meeting of commissioners under a town improvement act, assembled for the purposes of the act. The privilege accorded to the publication of judicial proceedings was supported on the ground that it was for the public benefit, and that they were conducted under the control of the judges. There is also another very important reason, which is applicable to contested judicial proceedings, and not to public meetings, namely, that both sides are heard. Hence it would seem, that the publication of ex parte proceedings, even in a court of justice, would not be protected. This was intimated by Coleridge, J., in his judgment, and reference may be made, in support of his Lordship's view, to Hoare v. Silverlock, (9 C. B. 20), and the cases therein cited. There Maule, J., said, "We cannot say that a fair account of proceedings, which must be public and not ex parte, is not, generally speaking, a justifiable publication. I say generally, not universally, for matters may take place in courts of justice the publication of which would be injurious to the public." And Williams, J., stated the rule to be, that "a fair account of the proceedings in a public court of justice, not being ex parte, is privileged."

Mr. Starkie says, "Courts of justice are open to all; the common law of the land is to be learned principally by attention to the practice and proceedings of such Courts, and therefore it is of essential importance to the public that such proceedings should, to a great extent at least, be communicated to all. . . . On principles of public convenience, the ordinary rule is, that no action can be maintained in respect of a fair and impartial report of a judicial proceeding. This rule is subject to several natural and necessary limitations—first, as to the subject-matter of the report; and, secondly, as to the manner in which the proceeding is reported. First, as to the subject-matter. As the privilege in such cases is founded upon grounds of public policy and convenience, it ceases where the nature of the investigation is such that to publish it would obviously be offensive and injurious to the public, as where it involves blasphemous or indecent matters. . . . . The publication also of ex parte proceedings in criminal cases is not only not privileged by the law, but is regarded as a great misdemeanour. Where the evidence is ex parte, the party charged has no means of establishing a defence; and such premature statements tend to excite undue prejudices against the accused, and to deprive him of the benefit of a fair and impartial trial; and therefore, in several instances, the publication of matters of criminal charge contained in depositions before magistrates has been held to be indictable. . . . It seems also that the publication of ex parte proceedings, even of a civil nature, when they are injurious to the characters of individuals, cannot be justified." (Law of Libel and Slander, vol. 1, pp. 261, 263—265).

Neither upon principle, therefore, nor by analogy, can the immunity which is claimed for reporting the proceedings at public meetings be supported. It does not follow that there is a remedy against the person uttering the slander at the meeting, where there is a remedy against the publisher of the defamation in a written form, because the words uttered may not be actionable when spoken, and yet may be so when written. And this distinction between verbal and written defamation will be found for the most part to be a substantial one on examination; for although there is little difference between slandering A. to B. verbally, or by letter to B., yet there is a vast difference between uttering a slander against A. to few or many persons, and publishing it in a newspaper or other work of public circulation[*].

Parliament continues to furnish matter of peculiar interest to the Legal Profession.

[*] We regret to perceive that it has lately become a habit with the Times to abuse the judges whenever they decide the law contrary to the views or wishes of that journal. An exception, however, to such abuse appears in their leader of the 18th inst., where they heap compliments upon Lord Campbell in a fulsome and exaggerated style; but even then they cannot refrain from decrying the other learned judges of Westminster Hall. The language applied to these eminent and justly-respected men shews that the writer can neither understand nor appreciate the mental power, the deep learning, the independence, and sincere love of justice by which they are distinguished.

In the House of Commons on the 12th instant Mr. Napier moved that an humble address be presented to her Majesty, praying that she will be graciously pleased to take into consideration, as an urgent measure of administrative reform, the formation of a separate and responsible department for the affairs of public justice.

The following speeches of Mr. Collier and the Attorney-General contain the gist of the debate upon the subject:—

Mr. Collier seconded the motion, and expressed his fears lest the House and the country should be getting tired of hearing about law reforms. So much was said about law reforms each session, and so little done, that the public might be excused for believing there was an understanding among the lawyers to talk, but not to act, upon the subject. He, however, believed that the country took a great interest in the matter, and did not look with satisfaction upon the present state of our tribunals and of our laws. Indeed, it could not be otherwise when the Courts of law and of equity dealt with the same matters on totally distinct principles, and that again in the ecclesiastical courts a third set of principles was acted upon. No one could have regarded with satisfaction the recent fight of the Courts of Chancery and Bankruptcy over the dead body of the British Bank. If they looked to the highest tribunals they found two supreme co-ordinate courts, one of which, the Committee of the Privy Council, performed its functions to the satisfaction of all parties, while the other, the appellate tribunal of the House of Lords, gave equal dissatisfaction. Nor was the state of the law more satisfactory than the state of the tribunals. The statute-book was still a rude undigested mass, which had defied all the attempts at consolidation from the days of Bacon to Mr. Bellenden Ker. The country wished for a removal of the obstacles to the transfer of land, and it also objected to the law governing the relations between husband and wife, which were disgraceful to any civilised country. There were complaints respecting the ecclesiastical law; and the mercantile laws of England and Scotland were materially different, no attempt being made to harmonise them. What had been the attempts to remedy those defects? Commissions were appointed, to whom the various matters were committed in a vague manner, which involved a fruitless result. Those commissions were composed of men with different opinions, who soon came to a dead-lock, and each member made his own report. As a rule, commissions were abortive. There had been, no doubt, some law reforms, but they were made to meet the exigency of the moment, without any comprehensive view of the law as a whole. He did not mean to impute blame to any one. Every year there was a magnificent programme of law reforms announced by the Government. There were about half a dozen field-days for the lawyers, who made perhaps longer speeches than the House cared to hear. The subject having been ventilated, the measures were postponed from day to day, and finally laid on the shelf. The noble lord at the head of the Government did not regard such questions with such fervour as he did those which might involve the stability of his administration. He feared that the present session was not likely to be more fruitful of results in the way of law reforms than its predecessors. The hon. and learned gentleman (the Attorney-General) had sketched out in his address to his constituents at Aylesbury a masterly programme, which unfortunately he had not been able to carry out. The registry of landed property was an abortive scheme, as was also the amendment of the ecclesiastical law, for the measure propounded by the Lord Chancellor was not one that that House would entertain for a moment. It was right, however, to say that he believed his hon. and learned friend, (the Attorney-General), who was a sincere law reformer, had never been in favour of a transference of the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts to the Courts of Chancery. The only measures to be expected this session were those which the Lord Chancellor had announced a few evenings since. He did not cast blame upon the law officers of the Crown, for he believed the Lord Chancellor, with his duties in Chancery, could not fulfil the duties of a minister of justice, such as it was the desire of the right hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Napier) to see created. At present it would be impossible for the Lord Chancellor to be at the head of a department of justice, because he had no staff to assist him. It was equally impossible that the duties of such department should be performed by the Attorney-General or the Solicitor-General. It unfortunately happened that the engagements of the Lord Chancellor and the Attorney-General were such that they appeared to have no time for consultation; they did not act in unison; and, if he might be allowed the expression, in the shipwreck of law reform they floated away in contrary directions, upon different rafts. The resolution affirmed that there ought to be "a separate and responsible department for the affairs of public justice," and in that proposition he did not hesitate to concur. Such a department might collect most valuable information, and greatly improve the judicial statistics of the country. It might receive and record suggestions from the judges or other parties worthy of attention, and conduct, methodically and scientifically, inquiries which were now deputed to many desultory commissions. The functions of such a department might also include the progressive amendment of the law. Under that head he placed the consolidation of the statute law; and with respect to the plan of the present Statute-law Commission, of consolidating the acts relating to certain subjects from time to time, he thought it neither the best nor most expeditious mode of proceeding. It should be done as a whole, by a competent staff, under the supervision of a competent officer, and when done submitted to Parliament for confirmation by one instead of by 500 acts. The department of public justice might also have the duty of preparing and passing through Parliament the measures of law reform for which the Government consented to be responsible. He would like to see those measures taken up by the Government in a determined spirit, and as much importance attached to being beaten on an ecclesiastical courts bill as upon any other question of foreign or domestic policy. The department might correct current legislation, instead of that duty being delegated to a board under the superintendence of the two Houses of Parliament; not that he would allow any interference with private legislation, but merely give members the opportunity of obtaining assistance and advice. It was a question for grave consideration whether the head of the department might not be intrusted with a power of supervision over the county court judges and justices of the peace, and the power of criminal appeal, now in the hands of the Secretary of State for the Home Department. He did not for a moment wish to insinuate that those functions were not properly performed by the right hon. baronet, (Sir G. Grey); but the question was, whether they ought not to be performed by some high legal authority. He had given an outline of the duties which might be advantageously imposed upon the department of public justice. With respect to the head of it, the motion did not state whether he would sit in the House of Lords or in the House of Commons. It would be perfectly consistent with the resolution to make the Lord Chancellor the Minister of Justice, and that point, in his opinion, deserved consideration. But if the duties of the Lord Chancellor were too onerous to allow of such an arrangement, then the head of the department ought to be a member of the House of Commons—a plan which, in some respects, might be still more advantageous. He approved of the motion not fettering the decision of the Government; and though it might be said to be only an abstract resolution, he had faith in the efficacy of abstract resolutions. He believed that in affirming the resolution they would be accomplishing an object long and ardently desired by law reformers, and taking one of the most important steps towards rendering the administration of justice consonant with the wants and civilisation of the people.

The Attorney-General said, the question had not escaped the attention of the Government, but they had reserved until this discussion the statement of their views. He did not complain of the resolution, because it was couched in general terms, and in accepting it, it must be distinctly understood that the Government did not recognise, as a consequence of its adoption, the establishment of a separate Minister of Justice. He did not think that at present there was any necessity for the introduction of such an officer. He thought that all the objects of the resolution might be more effectually carried out by means of existing machinery than by instituting a change in the constitution. It would be abundantly clear to those who had given the subject anything beyond the most superficial attention, that it was utterly impossible to introduce into the Cabinet a Minister of Justice, while the Lord Chancellor and the Home Secretary were members of it, without introducing also disagreement and contention, and destroying, in point of fact, that unity which was essential to its efficiency. A few years ago a new tribunal was constituted—the Court of Appeal of the Lords Justices. One of the reasons for establishing that tribunal was, that by relieving the Lord Chancellor of a portion of the judicial duties which pressed so heavily upon him, it would be in his power to discharge more directly the duties that belonged to him as Minister of Justice. It was perfectly within the power of that distinguished officer, if he were armed with a sufficient staff, to accomplish all that was needed. Three great objects were proposed to be accomplished—first, the complete and effectual superintendence over the administration of justice in all its departments; secondly, the superintending and effectually carrying out the process of the amendment of the law; and, thirdly, the giving prompt, effectual, and complete assistance to the business of current legislation. The Government would not omit to give that attention to the subject of the present resolution which its importance deserved; but one great peculiarity and misfortune was the constitution and distinct jurisdiction of our Courts. There were a great number of Courts, none of which were armed with the power of doing justice on any one subject. The necessity was therefore imposed upon the suitor of resorting to a great number of Courts to obtain a little portion of justice—first from one, and then from the other. That state of things ought not to be allowed to continue; but the apathy of the people of this country in regard to law reform was so great that it was not easy to carry a change in the law. If this system continued, it spoke plainly enough for the necessity of there being some great department charged with the duty of carefully watching and superintending the working of these numerous tribunals, and endeavouring to reduce into harmony a system which was otherwise altogether incongruous. A small portion of insolvency was committed to the Insolvency Court, a portion of bankruptcy was intrusted to the Bankruptcy Court, another statutory tribunal had the duty of carrying out the Winding-up Acts, and there were the Courts of law, which were opposed to the Courts of equity. There were numerous county court judges, and there was also the system of criminal procedure, which was utterly defective in principle. Prosecutions were instituted and conducted without control, and no adequate superintendence was exercised over the sentences and procedure of the criminal courts. The whole system stood in such a situation that the only hope was in charging a great and responsible department with the duty of superintending it carefully, and collecting the details for one great report to Parliament, arranging and educing those general conclusions with regard to the amendment of the system in principle and practice which the examination of those statistics would naturally suggest to philosophic minds devoted exclusively and in combination to the examination of these questions. With regard to the criminal law, the manner in which prosecutions were conducted required attention. A committee sat upon this subject last session. A party instituted prosecutions on his own judgment, and no one possessed any power of effectual control when emergencies arose. He knew, from his own experience, that no machinery existed adequate to the emergencies that might arise. At present no great department existed to which could be committed, in a manner satisfactory to the country, the consideration of the great subject of legal reform, and from which could come down a measure ex cathedrâ, and armed with authority. If proposals of law reform came down from such an authority the House would judge of them with confidence, undistracted by the projects and proposals of different members. He might illustrate this from what happened last session. He had proposed a bill on the alteration of the testamentary courts, substituting some cheap and efficient mode of answering the purposes discharged by the equity and testamentary courts, and securing the complete administration of justice in distributing the estates of testators. The moment he brought that bill in, the member for Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly) brought forward a different bill, while the hon. and learned member for Plymouth brought forward a bill which differed from either of the others. The introduction of these three bills had placed the House in a position of great perplexity and doubt, and he had tried to remove that perplexity by adopting in his measure the best provisions of the other two bills. But the measure, with those alterations, was not ready until so late a period that it was utterly impossible to carry it through Parliament in the course of last session. The time had been lost in deciding between these competitive schemes; whereas, if one of them had been brought forward with the sanction of a great department, the House would have had no difficulty in adopting it. Many of the discussions upon bills which now took place, and ended in nothing, would be avoided if every bill introduced were sanctioned by proper authorities. He would advert to another circumstance which proved the absolute necessity for some arrangement. The law consisted of the written and of the unwritten law. The written law was composed of a great number of statutes, many of them unfortunately so inconsistent with each other that it was extremely difficult to ascertain the exact state of the law. The unwritten law was even in a worse position. It was to be found in many hundred volumes of reports, to which continual additions were being made without any sufficient authority or any proper control. Any gentleman of the Bar who published a volume of cases, and prefixed his name to it, added to the unwritten law; and numbers of volumes were, in fact, being produced year after year, which judges felt bound to recognise when they were cited in courts of justice. The laws of a great country ought not to be embodied in such unauthorised, unauthenticated publications as these. While, therefore, the written law required revision, consolidation, and reduction, the same process was required in a tenfold degree by the unwritten law; but that process could only be effectually carried on under the guidance of a great department. In the observations he had made, illustrating the necessity of immediate attention being paid to the subject, he had stated more particularly his own views and opinions, to which the Government were not to be regarded as pledged.

The motion was agreed to.

The Lord Chancellor is about to lay on the table seven bills, forming a complete consolidation of criminal offences. It had been found necessary, he said, to begin from the statutes passed last year, and to go backward through the whole statute-book, section by section, in order to see what sections still remained in force which required to be consolidated.

Lord Brougham despaired of these digests ever becoming law, unless confidence were placed in those who prepared them, and Parliament were ready in general to accept and adopt them.

The Government are not at present prepared to bring in a bill for appointing a public prosecutor. The Solicitor-General stated the reason to be the great difficulty besetting the question.

LORD CRANWORTH'S DIVORCE BILL, AND LORD BROUGHAM'S MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY BILL.

(From a Correspondent).

The material alterations in the law which Lord Cranworth proposes are—

1. To enable a wife to obtain a sentence of separation à mensâ et thoro on the ground of desertion by her husband for two years without reasonable cause.
2. To enable husband and wife to make an agreement by an acknowledged deed which shall have the effect of a sentence of separation.
3. To place a wife separated from her husband by sentence or agreement in the position of a single woman in respect of property acquired after the separation, and of the right and liability to sue and be sued: so, however, that cohabitation shall restore her to her status, but with the property to her separate use.
4. To enable the Court to dissolve a marriage on the ground of the wife's adultery, or of the husband's incestuous adultery, or adultery combined with such cruelty as would alone entitle the wife to a separation, or adultery combined with desertion for two years without reasonable cause: the decree to leave the parties free to contract marriage after confirmation on appeal or the lapse of the right to appeal; and the Court to have power to make provision as to the custody of the children.

It is unfortunate every way that these matters, which cannot be touched without affecting the soul and the soul's health, not of a few individuals merely, but of society itself, should be mixed up with and obscured by mere ritual—dealt with in a bill concerning jurisdictions, procedure, and vested interests. The present age, defective everywhere of imagination, is nowhere more so than in its legislation. In the old times—not more credulous perhaps, certainly more faithful and considerate than these—lawgivers (their mastery no less seen in forbearance than in action) regarded human laws in success rather than in failure, as rules observed more than as orders enforced or perhaps evaded; and estimated the goodness of a law by its operation on social habits, not by the columns of judicial statistics. Our modern legislators (by what apprenticeship they gained their privilege it would be hard to say) seem unable to conceive of laws as operating otherwise than in the exceptional cases where they are broken, or called into apparent action. They cannot imagine a law as sleeping—in security, not in impotence—and while sleeping, honoured by obedience and its fruits. Among the superstitions of this age of visible signs and testimonials, which can only see the Power in the Temple at the appointed hour of service, and misses it in daily life, is to be reckoned the superstition of recognising the law only in its courts, solving doubts, redressing wrongs. If the law were perfect, and its administration perfectly provided for, there would be no doubts, no wrongs, no courts. So far as its pomp is seen in its courts—the public temples—it is dishonoured and absent from the domestic altars.

"Hard cases make bad law" is a wise old maxim, which the very Chancellor who has proposed so much bad legislation sometimes repeats and applies in his own court—a maxim which, though still honoured in Westminster Hall, has long been forgetten in St. Stephen's Chapel, where, for want of occupation in the correction of some great social error, legislation has of late been principally occupied in puny, ignorant contests with hard cases—forgetting that hard cases are merely exceptional cases, when they are not the wrongs of classes crying for redress with authority, and under a more universal name. Thus the Legislature, magnifying in the narrow field of its microscope the hardships of those bakers, tailors, clerks, spinsters, widows, idlers, and else, who, seeking to appropriate the profits of some industry or adventure they neither work in nor understand, found only its losses, lately struck a blow at commercial credit, which we can only pray its constitution may be strong enough to resist. And now we are asked—upon sight of some hearths, cold, deserted, desolate, or worse, dishonoured, outraged—to legislate for them alone, without inquiring what dangers we may by such legislation bring upon those (many times more numerous, it is to be hoped) whose altar fires burn, dimly it may be, but with a glow not to be mended by any possible human stirring.

We have nothing to say on the separation (or divorce à mensâ et thoro) clauses of the Lord Chancellor's bill, beyond this—that they are insufficient. When a wife desires to leave bed and board, with or without cause, there is small wisdom in seeking to restrain her by any compulsion, and no reason for subjecting her to the ordeal of a judicial inquiry. The simple emancipation of every wife's person and property from her husband's control is what is needed and all that is needed, except a provision for the custody of the children—a problem not, perhaps, insoluble, though hitherto unsolved. When the husband seeks a separation, the interference of the Court may be necessary to absolve him, if cause be, from that obligation to maintain his wife and children which by the marriage contract he undertakes in return for her undertaking the part of an unproductive housekeeper and relinquishing of the position and vantage ground, and often of the very capabilities, of a worker for her own bread.

We have nothing now to say on the substitution of an ordinary court for the Legislature in deciding questions of divorce à vinculo. If an improvement, it is one of detail. The first business is to decide in what cases, if in any, is divorce à vinculo to be allowed. We have some confidence in the House of Lords that they will not consent to any alteration of the law of divorce in the way of relaxation; but though this confidence be well founded, it is not a slight thing that so rash and momentous an alteration as that of allowing divorce on the wife's application should be seriously proposed by a Lord Chancellor with the sanction of his Government.

Unless we are prepared to break up society, and rely for its re-union on some other ties than those of domestic life, we must preserve the marriage bond, in theory and in practice, indissoluble. Man and wife must feel that for their joint lives they have played a final stake with fortune. If it were otherwise, no one could sleep secure; suspicion, if not danger, would haunt every household. All the sparks of discontent, that are now commonly trodden out as they fall, would be supplied with fuel and blown into flame; caprice, inconstancy, satiety, interest, would have full play; intrigue, flattery, and calumny would have scope and a definite attainable end; each one's friends of the opposite sex would by the other be regarded as possible enemies and betrayers, the more dangerous the dearer.

Permission to marry again after the wife's adultery is practically given to the husband, if he is rich enough, by our constitution. It may be that even this stinted license is mischievous and demoralising, and that the mischief would be spread in certain directions by cheapening the process; but as, in most circles in this country, a wife's adultery, even though known to be committed only as a necessary part of the procedure for divorce and re-marriage, would be her social death, the mischief cannot be very great. But while society treats men's offences against chastity as venial, to enact that divorce à vinculo may be granted on the ground of the man's adultery and desertion for two years, is to enact that divorce à vinculo with mutual consent shall be free, after due time for deliberation. We say nothing of the provision against collusion—it is worthless. Has the Lord Chancellor never read, or can he have forgotten, the striking illustration of the consequences of easy divorce in the corrupted morals of Rome, when Augustus found it necessary, in order to encourage marriage, which had become unfashionable, to impose restrictions on separation?

Lord Brougham's proposed alterations in the law relating to the property of married women are well intended, but not altogether judicious. He would have the law regard a married woman as single in respect of property belonging to her at her marriage, or which afterwards is given to or devolves on her, or is acquired by her labour. This would be well if the law in other respects regarded her as such an independent unit. But her personal identity is merged in her husband's, and the impossibility of reconciling the possession of property with the condition of a slave has been shewn in the working of the Chancery institution of separate estate. For the evils incident to the separate peculium of married women, the conveyancers, with the sanction of the Chancellors, have contrived a Chancery remedy, in the shape of a restraint on anticipation; but this at best is but fetter against fetter, and could not be adapted to such a comprehensive measure as Lord Brougham contemplates. What is wanted, if not before, at least concurrently with, the grant of free rights of property, is absolute freedom of person and action, without which the other rights are little better than a mockery. At present the doctrine of equity gives absolute protection to the reversionary interests of married women in personal property; her husband cannot even beat it out of her. Lord Brougham proposes to endow her with an additional capacity for injury in that respect.

Besides its defects in principle, the bill is faulty in construction and detail; the provisions have been imperfectly conceived, and therefore are inaccurately expressed. If passed in its present form, it would give rise to many doubts. What is wanted is a simple enactment, accurately worded, to the effect that marriage shall not alter the rights and duties of a woman with respect to personal freedom and protection, property and contracts, with perhaps certain exceptions as to her personal liability on her contracts, and provisions limiting the husband's obligation for her engagements.

Commissioner to administer Oaths in Chancery.—The Lord Chancellor has appointed Francis James Coleridge, Gent., of Ottery St. Mary, Devonshire, to be a Commissioner to administer oaths in the High Court of Chancery in England.

ABSTRACTS OF BILLS IN PROGRESS.

Lord Cranworth's Bill to amend the Law relating to Divorce and Matrimonial Causes in England.

Sect. 1. Commencement of act.

2. Jurisdiction in matters matrimonial now vested in Ecclesiastical Courts to cease, except as to granting marriage licenses.

3. The court may enforce prior decrees or orders.

4. Pending suits to be transferred.

5. Jurisdiction over causes matrimonial to be exercised by the court of marriage and divorce; provided that no suit shall be entertained for jactitation of marriage.

6. The Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, the Lord Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer, and the Dean of the Arches shall be the judges of the said court, and any three of them, of whom the Dean of the Arches shall be one, shall be a quorum.

7. The Dean of the Arches to be the Judge Ordinary, and may hear and determine all matters, except petitions for the dissolving of any marriage.

8. Judge to take oath.

9. Who to act as judge during the absence of the Judge Ordinary.

10. Sittings of the court.

11. Seal of the court.

12. Officers of the court.

13. Advocates and proctors of any ecclesiastical court in England, and barristers, attornies, and solicitors, may practise as counsel, solicitors, or attornies respectively in the court, subject to regulations to be made by the court.

14. Court to act on the principles of the ecclesiastical courts.

15. Wife may petition for a divorce à mensâ et thoro on the ground that she has been deserted by her husband without reasonable excuse for two years or upwards, and the court, on being satisfied of the truth of the allegations of such petition, may, if it shall see fit, decree a divorce à mensâ et thoro accordingly.

16. The court may order alimony to be paid either to the wife or to a trustee, and may impose terms as to the giving indemnity to husband, and any other terms or restrictions.

17. Husband and wife may, by deed attested by two witnesses, and acknowledged by the wife, (as in the case of a disposition of lands), and inrolled in the court, agree to live separate, and make dispositions or agreements of or concerning their property respectively, which shall have the like validity as if the wife were free from legal disability; after which no suit shall be maintainable for restitution of conjugal rights.

18. In case of a divorce à mensâ et thoro on the petition of the wife, or of separation by deed, the wife shall, whilst the separation continues, be considered, with respect to property of every description which she may afterwards acquire, as a feme sole, such property on her decease intestate to go as if her husband were dead; and if she again cohabit with her husband, her property shall be held to her separate use, and be settled accordingly.

19. In every case of a divorce à mensâ et thoro obtained on the petition of the wife, or of separation by deed, the wife shall, whilst so separated, be considered as a feme sole for the purposes of contract and suing and being sued in any civil proceeding, and her husband shall not be liable in respect of her engagements: provided, that if alimony decreed or agreed for is not duly paid by the husband, he shall be liable for necessaries supplied for her use. Saving of joint powers.

20. Husband may petition that his marriage may be dissolved, on the ground of wife's adultery; and wife may petition that her marriage may be dissolved, on the ground that husband has been guilty of incestuous adultery, or of bigamy, or of adultery with such cruelty as without adultery would have entitled her to a divorce à mensâ et thoro, or of adultery with desertion without reasonable excuse for two years or upwards.

21. Court to be satisfied of absence of collusion.

22. Dismissal of petition.

23. If the court is satisfied that the case has been proved, and shall not find that the petitioner has committed adultery during the marriage, or has been accessory to or conniving at the adultery complained of, or has condoned the same, the court shall declare the marriage dissolved, but may withhold decree on the ground of unreasonable delay, or of cruelty, or of desertion without reasonable cause.

24. Court may order alimony on decree for dissolution.

25. After decree, parties may marry again after expiration of time limited for appeal.

26. In suit for dissolution court may make interim and final orders for custody of children.

27. Issues may be tried before the court.

28. Court may direct issues to try any fact.

29. Affidavit in support of a petition.

30. Service of petition.

31. Examination of petitioner.

32. Adjournment.

33. Mode of taking evidence, orally and otherwise.

34. Court may issue commissions or give orders for examination of witnesses abroad or unable to attend.

35. Rules of evidence in common-law courts to be observed.

36. Attendance of witnesses on the court.

37. Penalties for false evidence.

38. Costs.

39. Enforcement of orders and decrees.

40. Power to make rules and orders, and to regulate fees.

41. Party may appeal from the Judge Ordinary within three calendar months to the full court, whose decision shall be final. Party may appeal from the full court on petition for dissolution of marriage, to House of Lords, but only on a question of law, to be stated in a case.

43. Produce of fees and stamps to be paid to a fee-fund account.

44. Payments to Dean of the Arches and to officers of the Arches Court in respect to their duties under this act.

45. The Commissioners of the Treasury may grant compensation to judges, registrars, and officers in the courts matrimonial. subject to the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 77, s. 25, and the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 98, s. 9; such compensation to be subject to set off of salary from any office to be given to such officer.

46. Payment of salaries, &c.

47. Drafts on fee fund.

48. Lord Chancellor may order surplus of fee fund to be paid into the Exchequer. Deficiency out of Consolidated Fund.

49. Records, &c. to be transmitted from all ecclesiastical courts.

50. Rules to be laid before Parliament.

15. Officers of the court to execute their offices in person. Registrars and clerks of the principal registry not to act as proctors, &c.

16. Seal of the court.

17. The court to have throughout all England the same powers as the Prerogative Court within the province of Canterbury. Suits for legacies or distribution not to be entertained.

18. Power to examine witnesses. Production of deeds, &c.

19. Powers of court to enforce orders.

20. Order to produce any instrument purporting to be testamentary.

21. Registrars, &c. to have power to administer oaths. Power to appoint also commissioners to administer oaths, &c.

22. Forging or counterfeiting seal or signature of officers. Penalty.

23. Procedure and practice of the Court of Probate, except where otherwise provided by this act, or by rules or orders, to be, so far as may be, according to the present procedure and practice in the Prerogative Court.

24. Lord Chancellor may make rules and orders for regulating the procedure of the court.

25. Mode of taking evidence in contentious matters, orally or otherwise.

26. Court may issue commissions or give orders for the examination of witnesses abroad or unable to attend.

27. Rules of evidence in common-law courts to be observed.

28. Court may direct issues to courts of law.

29. Verdict of jury conclusive.

30. Except and subject as herein provided, an appeal shall lie to the Court of Appeal in Chancery, and thence, or immediately and without so appealing, to the House of Lords, from all orders or decrees of the Court of Probate.

31. Advocates admitted to practise. Barristers may practise in contentious causes.

32. Proctors admitted to practise upon application at any time within one year after the passing of this act, without payment of fee or stamp duty: except as aforesaid the admission of persons to be proctors of the court shall be in the discretion of the judge, subject to the rules or orders: proctors now practising, or any persons hereafter admitted, not to be entitled to any compensation in case the business of the Court of Probate be thrown open to any other class or classes of persons.

33. Solicitors and attornies admitted to practise in contentious business.

34. Probates and administration may be granted in common form by district registrars in certain cases, if it appear by affidavit that the testator or intestate at his death had a fixed place of abode within the district, and that his personal estate, not held in trust, but without deducting anything on account of his debts, is under the value of 1500*l.*

35. Affidavit conclusive, and grant irrevocable.

36. District registrars not to make grants where there is contention, &c.

37. District registrar, in case of doubt as to grant, to take the directions of the judge.

38. District registrars to transmit lists every fortnight of probates and administrations, and copies of wills.

39. District registrars to preserve original wills.

40. Caveats.

41. Where personalty under 200*l.*, and real property under 300*l.*, county court to have jurisdiction.

42. Registrar of county court to transmit certificate of decree for grant or revocation of probate.

43. The judge of the county court to decide causes and enforce judgments as in other cases.

44. Affidavit of the facts giving the county courts jurisdiction to be conclusive, unless disproved while the matter is pending.

45. Appeal from the judge of the county court to court of common law.

46. Option of applying to Court of Probate in every case.

47. Lord Chancellor to make rules and orders regulating the procedure of county courts under the act.

48. Where a will affecting real estate is proved in solemn form, or is the subject of a contentious proceeding, the heir and persons interested in the real estate to be cited.

49. Where the will is proved in solemn form, or its validity otherwise decided on, the decree of the court to be binding on the persons interested in the real estate.

50. Heir in certain cases not to be cited, or affected by probate, where it is shewn to the court that the deceased was not known to be seised of or entitled to any real estate beneficially at the time of his death, or where the will would not pass or affect real estate.

51. Probate or office copy to be evidence of the will in suits concerning real estate, save where the validity of the will is put in issue.

52. As to costs of proof of will.

53. Original wills to be deposited in metropolis.

54. Calendars to be made up and printed.

93. Rules and orders to be laid before Parliament.

Lord Brougham's Bill to amend the Law with respect to the Property of Married Women.

Sect. 1. The real and personal estate to which any woman who shall marry after this act shall have come into operation shall be entitled at her marriage shall be held and enjoyed by her to her separate use.

2. Any real or personal estate to which a married woman may during coverture become entitled, by gift, purchase, or devolution, or by her earnings or labour, or otherwise, shall be held by her to her sole and separate use.

3. A married woman, with respect to her separate estate under this act, shall be liable upon any contracts which she may enter into, or shall have entered into before coverture, and she may sue and be sued in respect thereof in her own name alone.

4. Any decree, judgment, rule, or order obtained against a married woman, in respect of any contract entered into by her, shall have the same effect upon her real and personal estate as if she were a feme sole.

5. A husband shall not be liable in respect of any debts, contracts, or engagements of his wife incurred or entered into by her before marriage, except to the value or amount of any real or personal estate of his wife which may have been or be settled upon the husband or the children of the marriage.

6. Separate estate of wife under this act liable, jointly with husband's estate, to any execution on joint contract; coverture not to be pleaded.

7. Wife not to be arrested in any suit or action under act.

8. Wife may dispose of, and deal with, and bequeath separate estate.

9. Upon the death of any married woman, her real and personal estate shall be liable to her debts, contracts, and engagements, as if she had died a feme sole.

10. In the event of the death of a married woman intestate, her husband shall take the same estate, interest, or distributive share in such real or personal estate of or to which his wife shall die seised, possessed, or entitled to her separate use as aforesaid, as such married woman would have taken had such real or personal estate belonged to her husband, and he had died intestate.

11. Subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, the personal estate of such married woman, of or to which she shall be or become possessed or entitled to her separate use under the provisions hereinbefore contained, shall, if she have any children, be distributed between or amongst them equally; or if she have only one child, the same shall go and belong to such child; but if she have no child, then the same personal estate, subject as aforesaid, shall go or be distributed to or amongst such person or persons as would under the Statutes of Distribution be entitled thereto had such married woman died a feme sole.

12. Nothing in this act contained shall interfere with any settlement, or agreement for a settlement, made in consideration of any marriage, except as hereinbefore mentioned.

13. Interpretation of terms.

14. This act shall not extend to Scotland or Ireland.

15. This act may be cited as "The Married Women's Property Act, 1858."

CAUTION.—TO TRADESMEN, MERCHANTS, SHIPPERS, OUTFITTERS, &c.

WHEREAS it has lately come to my knowledge that some unprincipled person or persons have for some time past been imposing upon the public, by selling to the Trade and others a spurious article under the name of BOND'S PERMANENT MARKING INK; this is to give Notice, that I am the original and sole Proprietor and Manufacturer of the said Article, and do not employ any traveller, or authorise any persons to represent themselves as coming from my establishment, for the purpose of selling the said Ink. This Caution is published by me to prevent further imposition upon the public, and serious injury to myself.

E. R. BOND, Sole Executrix and Widow of the late John Bond, 28, Long-lane, West Smithfield, London.

 To avoid disappointment from the substitution of counterfeits, be careful to ask for the genuine Bond's Permanent Marking Ink; and further to distinguish it, observe that NO SIXPENNY SIZE is or has at any time been prepared by him, the Inventor and Proprietor.

 Orders for THE JURIST given to any Newsman, or letter (post-paid) sent to the Office, No. 3, CHANCERY LANE, or to STEVENS & NORTON, 26, BELL YARD, LINCOLN'S INN, will insure its punctual delivery in London, or its being forwarded on the evening of publication, through the medium of the Post Office, to the Country.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 28, 1857.

THE important bill relative to "the property of married women," introduced by Lord Brougham, and read the first time in the House of Lords, is well deserving of our serious consideration. Its main and leading principle is to give to a married woman, in the absence of contract, the same power over her property and earnings as if she were a feme sole. That the laws as affecting the property of married women are imperfect and unjust will, we believe, be admitted by most persons who will dispassionately examine them. It cannot, however, but be admitted that the mode in which they ought to be amended in the most efficient manner is a question upon which there is much difference of opinion.

A short summary of the common law, as affecting the property of married women, and the modifications introduced therein by Courts of equity with the object of correcting its imperfections and severity, will perhaps be useful in order to enable us to form a correct opinion upon this interesting and important subject.

"By marriage," it is observed by Blackstone in his Commentaries, (1 Bl. Com. 442), "the husband and wife are one person in law; that is, the very being or legal existence of the woman is suspended during the marriage, or at least is incorporated and consolidated into that of her husband. . . . Upon this principle of an union of persons in husband and wife depend almost all the legal rights, duties, and disabilities that either of them acquire by the marriage." In consequence of this maxim, the husband upon marriage retains all his own property, and at the same time acquires in most cases absolute dominion over the property of his wife. The wife, in fact, at law becomes a mere nonentity; she can neither sue nor be sued; and except under a power, or as to personalty by the permission of her husband, she can make no will; while on the other hand he becomes liable for necessaries supplied to her, and for debts incurred by her previous to her marriage.

To enter more into particulars. Upon marriage, the husband retains the whole of his own personal property of every kind, and also his chattels real, as leaseholds; his wife during his life takes nothing.

The husband, however, becomes the absolute owner of the personalty in the possession of his wife at the time of marriage, or which may accrue to her during the continuance of the coverture, such as goods and chattels or money either given to or earned by her. He also becomes absolute owner of such of her choses in action—that is to say, such of her personal property—as are not capable of immediate tangible possession, as debts owing to her, arrears of rent, legacies, residuary personal estate, money in the funds, &c., as he may have reduced into possession during the coverture; and if she dies in his lifetime before he has done so, he will become absolutely entitled to them as her administrator. In one event only, that of the husband's death in the life of his wife, will she become entitled by survivorship to such of her own choses in action as her husband may not have reduced into possession; nor will such right be defeated by the assignment of her husband, whether it be by operation of law, as upon his bankruptcy or insolvency, or for valuable consideration, as the assignees will merely stand in the same position as the husband.

If the wife has a reversionary interest in personalty which falls into possession during the life of the husband, he may acquire the absolute ownership thereof; although, if it do not fall into possession, he cannot, even with the consent of the wife, dispose of such interest so as to bind the right of the wife thereto by survivorship. (Whittle v. Henning, 2 Ph. 731).

With regard to his wife's leaseholds, the husband may during his life receive the rents, and he may alien the leaseholds, either absolutely by sale, or partially by mortgage, and may by doing so, either wholly or partially, as the case may be, defeat his wife's right, upon his death, to her leaseholds. They are liable also to execution for the debts of the husband, and will be forfeited to the Crown upon his outlawry or attainder. (Macq. 26). If, however, he die before his wife without having aliened the leaseholds, or without their having been taken in execution or been forfeited, she will take them by survivorship. Should he, however, be the survivor, he will take them jure mariti, and not as her administrator.

The result, therefore, is, that in the absence of contract upon marriage, the wife takes no interest in the personal property of her husband, while the only interest which she retains in her own is the chance of taking by survivorship any choses in action which the husband may not have reduced into possession, or any leaseholds which he may not have aliened.

With regard to his own real estate, whether for life or of inheritance, the husband on his marriage retains the sole property in it. With regard, however, to the real estate of the wife, the husband at once acquires a right to receive the rents and profits during her life, and he can alienate his interest therein without the concurrence of his wife. Thus the wife upon her marriage, during the life of her husband, takes no interest in his real estate, and retains no interest in the rents and profits of her own.

Upon the death of the wife during the life of her husband, he will become, as we have before seen, as her administrator, absolutely entitled to her choses in action not reduced into possession, and also to her leaseholds jure mariti. With regard to the wife's freeholds of inheritance, whether in fee or in tail, the husband, if there be issue of the marriage who might inherit the estate, will be entitled during his life to the whole of the estate as tenant by the curtesy, and of such right he cannot be barred by any act of the wife. With regard to real estate of inheritance, (subject to the curtesy of her husband), the wife may, under the Fines and Recoveries Act, with his consent, by deed acknowledged, after having been examined, apart from her husband, by a judge of one of the superior courts, or Master in Chancery, or commissioners, dispose of her freeholds of inheritance, but she can make no devise thereof except under a power; and if she do not so dispose of them during her life, her estates in fee-simple will descend to her heir-at-law, and her estates in fee-tail will go to the next person entitled under the entail.

With regard to the husband's property upon his death intestate, the wife is only entitled to one-third of his personalty if there are any children of the marriage, and to one-half if there are none, the other half going to the next of kin of the husband; but if he have no next of kin, as, for instance, if he be a bastard, it would go to the Crown rather than to the wife. (Cave v. Roberts, 8 Sim. 214). With regard to his freeholds of inheritance, whether in fee or in tail, her right to dower—that is to say, to one-third of the estate during her life—has by the Dower Act, 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 105, been placed entirely in the power of her husband. Nothing, perhaps, will better illustrate the unfair manner in which women both have been and still are dealt with in respect to their property than by instituting a comparison between the provision which the husband takes out of his wife's freehold estates of inheritance as tenant by the curtesy, and that which the wife is entitled to out of his estates after his death in the shape of dower. It is true that the husband only becomes entitled to be tenant by the curtesy upon the actual birth of issue, who might have inherited; while to entitle the wife to dower it is only essential that her issue, if any, should be inheritable. The husband, however, is entitled as tenant by the curtesy to the whole estate of the wife for his life, while the wife is only entitled as dowress to one-third of his. Again: the husband was always entitled to be tenant by the curtesy, although the estate of the wife were equitable only; whereas by an absurd and unjust anomaly, arising from a decision of the House of Lords, the wife was not entitled to dower out of the equitable estate of her husband. This was a great hardship, inasmuch as by far the greater part of the land in this country has for a long period been vested in trustees, the interest of the husband being in general merely equitable. The late Dower Act cured this anomaly, by making women dowable out of equitable estates; but by a cruel mockery her right to dower (which formerly could not be affected by the husband alone, but required the consent of the wife by joining in a fine) was put at the mercy of her husband; for since the Dower Act no woman married after the 1st January, 1834, will be entitled to dower out of any estates absolutely disposed of by her husband in his lifetime or by his will, (sect. 4), and priority will be given to partial interests created by any disposition or will of the husband, and all debts, incumbrances, contracts, and engagements to which his land shall be subject, (sect. 5). So by the same act the husband may bar dower by a declaration in a deed (sect. 6) or will, (sect. 7); in the latter of which instruments he may render it subject to any conditions, restrictions, or directions, (sect. 9).

Above all, we must recollect that the testamentary power which is given to the husband, and withheld from the wife, enables him to leave her entirely without any provision. Thus, suppose a woman to have brought her husband a fortune of 100,000*l.*, which has not been settled, if he has not spent it during his life, or by dying intestate allowed only a portion of it to devolve upon his wife, he may by his will leave the whole of it to a mere stranger.

Hitherto we have principally confined ourselves to the strict legal rights of either party; let us now see what a Court of equity will do. The husband acquires the large interests which we have seen he takes in the property of his wife in consideration of the obligation which, upon marriage, he contracts, of maintaining her, and his children by her; but the common law is defective, inasmuch as it possesses no efficient means of insuring the performance of the duty which it imposes upon the husband, for the only direct remedy which the law affords is to compel a husband to maintain his wife and family, in order that they may not be chargeable on his parish. She has also an indirect remedy in her own hands—that of being able to bind her husband by her contracts for whatever comes within the definition of "necessaries."

The husband in the meantime, in many cases, has it in his power to alien all the property to which he is entitled jure mariti, or, upon his becoming bankrupt or insolvent, it vests in his assignees for the benefit of his creditors; and thus his wife, however great may have been the fortune he received from her, may with her children be left utterly destitute.

Courts of equity have from a very early period endeavoured to remedy this deficiency in the common law, by giving to the wife, in certain cases, a right to a provision out of her own property for herself and children; this right is called her "equity to a settlement." The wife's equity to a settlement arose thus—when the husband made an application to a Court of equity in order to obtain the property of his wife, the Court refused its assistance, except upon the terms of his making a settlement upon his wife and her children, if he had not already made a sufficient provision for her, and she required a settlement to be made. Eventually the wife herself was allowed to originate proceedings in equity for the same purpose. Where, however, the husband refused to make a settlement, the Court would retain the capital in its own hands, allowing the husband the interest so long as he was living with and maintained his wife, but if he neglected to do so, or deserted her, the Court of equity would pay the whole of the interest to the wife; while, the husband not being able to get the capital into his possession, the wife, if she survived him, would become entitled to it by survivorship. The principle thus gradually established and acted upon by Courts of equity is now this—that a wife is entitled to a provision out of her own property for herself and her children; and that, as far as it lies within the power of Courts of equity, they will prevent the husband obtaining possession of his wife's property, if she insists upon her equity, unless or until he has made a proper settlement upon her. This principle is indisputably far more just than the rule of the common law, which, as we have before seen, hands over to the husband the property of the wife, without any attempt to insure the performance of the obligation of properly providing for her; and if this be so, no valid reason can be alleged why the principle enforced in a court of equity, with respect to the property of married women which may fall within its cognisance should not be extended to every kind of property accruing to the wife during marriage; in other words, why what is equity in this respect should not become the law. It is absurd that the right of the wife should depend upon the nature of the property—a mere accident. For instance, suppose a married woman is entitled to a bond debt for 10,000*l.*; at present, the husband, by taking proceedings in a court of law in the name of himself and his wife, may obtain payment of it, and cannot be compelled, either by a Court of law or a Court of equity, to settle any part of it upon his wife. If, on the other hand, it were a sum of money in the Court of Chancery, or a legacy in the hands of executors or trustees, upon proceedings being taken in equity before payment be made thereof to the husband, a Court of equity would order a settlement to be made.

Perhaps the greatest hardship endured by married women is in those cases where, either in the lower ranks by manual labour, or in the educated classes by their literary or other pursuits, they obtain an income by their own personal exertions; for the law refuses, and equity is powerless, to protect them in the enjoyment of it, even in those cases where they have been deserted or ill-treated by their husbands.

Again: although we have seen that at law the existence of a woman on marriage becomes as it were merged in that of her husband, Courts of equity, recognising her separate existence, have for a long period allowed her to enjoy property settled to her separate use, to dispose of it, or the products of it, and to enter into contracts with respect to it, in the same mode as she could do with respect to the same property were she unmarried. Property left to the separate use of a married woman is generally preserved from the legal rights of the husband by vesting it in trustees; but if none are appointed, a Court of equity converts the husband into a trustee for her. Moreover, in order to protect the wife's separate estate from the influence which the husband might exercise over her, Courts of equity, departing from a well-known rule of law, by which the power of alienation is always considered incidental to property, have allowed a clause against anticipation to be attached to the separate use, so that a married woman could only from time to time, as it became due, receive the income of property settled to her separate use, but could not by any act alien or incumber her future income.

Having shewn how far Courts of equity have departed from the strict rules of law, by the recognition of the separate existence of married women, and by acknowledging and enforcing their right, even in the absence of contract, to a provision out of their own property—improvements upon the law, great, no doubt, but still imperfect—we propose at some future time to examine Lord Brougham's bill, discussing its principle, the provisions by which it is proposed to be carried out, and the probability of its affording a remedy for the defects and injustice of the law as it at present exists.

GUARDIANSHIP IN CHANCERY.

The case of Alicia Race raises some legal and constitutional questions of great interest and moment. The Court of Queen's Bench, in a solemn judgment, pronounced the mother guardian for nurture—i. e. especially for education, as well as maintenance; and the Vice-Chancellor has taken the child from the mother, and committed her to the care of strangers. It is of no little interest to inquire upon what principle rests the jurisdiction thus asserted. At common law the Crown had no right of guardianship, except over the heirs of its own tenants in capite. This appears plainly from Magna Charta, the very first articles of which refer to wardship, and jealously protect the heirs of those who thus held immediately of the Crown from royal extortion and oppression. That these alone should be thus protected by the charter clearly shews that as to any others the Crown had no claim of wardship; and the right carried with it such valuable incidents under the feudal system that it was asserted and contested keenly and constantly both by the Crown and by individual knights and nobles, so long as the feudal system existed. The right of guardianship in chivalry belonged to the lord of whom the lands were held, and only applied to heirs of lands held by knight service. It applied, as we find from Dalrymple, both to males and females, and terminated, save for certain purposes, at fourteen, the legal age of discretion. For heirs of lands not held in chivalry, but in "socage," there was no guardian in chivalry, and no right of guardianship in the Crown, whose right only existed in cases of tenancy by knight service. The father could in his lifetime appoint a guardian in chivalry; but he had not at common law the right of appointing a guardian by testament; and consequently, on his decease without having appointed a guardian, the lord, whether an individual or the Crown, assumed the position of guardian, supposing the lands to be held by knight service. If, however, they were not so held, but in socage, or if there were no lands descendible, then the mother was at common law guardian by nature for nurture until the age of fourteen. This was established, as against strangers, as long ago as the 9 Edw. 4, and on the case so establishing it the recent decision of the Queen's Bench mainly proceeded. That case, it is true, established the mother's right as against strangers; and there are plenty of cases shewing that her right yielded to that of guardian in chivalry. But where there was no guardian in chivalry—and the right of the Crown only existed in cases in which it held that position—her right by survivorship was clear at common law. One of the duties of guardianship was, as Coke says, to educate the ward virtuously, and especially to preserve the ward from "disparagement" in marriage—that is, it was the guardian's function to see that the ward was duly educated and married, according to his or her proper rank and position in society. No doubt the Crown was always, as parens patriæ, bound to protect infants—and not infants alone, but all persons, infant or adult—from ill-usage or abuse to the person. No doubt Chancery, as a court of conscience, always had, and even so early as the reign of Henry VI can be proved to have exercised, jurisdiction over trusts. But the Crown was not at common law guardian of any but its own wards; and it had and could have no wards but such as were heirs of its own tenants—i. e. those who held of the Crown. No precedents can be found of writs on the part of the Crown as to guardianship, save such as contain the words "qui tenuit de nobis in capite;" and cases can be cited from the Year Books to shew that even after the Court of Chancery had asserted its jurisdiction, the Crown was not allowed, either at common law or Chancery, (though surely, as this is so far a question, really, of common law, the forum cannot affect the question), to assert its right of wardship in any other case. Thus, for instance, in 1 Edw. 5 there was an information in Chancery by one who claimed to be the king's grantee of a guardianship against a stranger; and there was a demurrer, on the ground that no title in the Crown was shewn. It was deemed necessary to amend, by asserting tenure in chivalry. In 4 Hen. 7 an attempt was made, under the statute which gave the feudal lord the wardship of lands conveyed to uses, to set up for the Crown a claim, as ultimate and paramount lord of all the lands in the realm; but the claim did not succeed; and the Chief Justice laid down what is a very important principle upon this question, that the Crown can have no prerogative which it had not at common law and by immemorial usage. We have shewn that it had no right of guardianship by prerogative—i. e. in the presence of a legal guardian. No doubt it always had a power to control legal guardians in cases of abuse to the person or estate of the infant. But a jurisdiction to correct abuse in the exercise of a right is quite distinct from the possession of the right, or the power of withdrawing it at pleasure. The Crown is bound to protect the person and estate of any person against abuse. The only difference between the case of infants and adults is, that an adult is sui juris, and sues in his own person; an infant sues by prochein amy, or guardian, as against a stranger; and if the guardian is the wrongdoer the Crown could remove him or redress the wrong. So continued the law until the "Court of the King's Wards" was established by statute, the very title of which confirms the view deducible from the cases at common law, that the Crown was not guardian save of its own wards in chivalry—i. e. heirs of its own immediate tenants in capite. There are one or two cases in that court, cited by Reeve in his History of English Law, which, with Ratcliffe's case, (3 Rep. 37), fully support this argument; as do all the precedents of writs, whether in cancellariâ or at common law, all stating the ward to be the child of one "qui tenuit de nobis in capite." The Court of Wards and the feudal system were abolished in the time of Charles II, and the real nature and origin of the jurisdiction of Chancery in guardianship must be sought in the earliest cases in Chancery after that era. They are all subsequent to the statute of Charles II, giving the father the right of appointing a guardian by testament. At common law there was not that power; although the father, if a knight, could appoint a guardian in chivalry to act in his absence. The effect of the abolition of the feudal system was to abolish tenure in chivalry, and convert the tenure of all lands into tenure by socage; as to which the right of the mother by survivorship was at common law much the same as it was in the absence of any guardian in chivalry, or where there were no lands at all descendible at common law; the father's right in such cases survived to her; and so it would have been in all cases, but for the statute; and so it would be, after the statute, in any cases in which there was no testamentary guardian. Hence it would follow, that, save in cases of abuse, or cases of property in which there was an interest in the mother adverse to that of the infant, the mother's right would prevail in Chancery as against any one but the testamentary guardian. And this is the effect of the earlier cases on the subject immediately after the Revolution.

In the case of Beaufort v. Bertie (1 P. Wms. 703) the Chancellor said that the right of appointing a guardian devolved on the Court in consequence of the testamentary guardian having been attainted, and so civiliter mortuus. It does not appear that there was any mother surviving in that case; but it should seem from the language of the Court, that the Court has no jurisdiction, in the case of a testamentary guardian, on the ground of abuse, which it has not in the case of the father himself. In the case of Eyre v. Shaftesbury (1 P. Wms.) the right of the testamentary guardian was enforced, as against the mother, on the ground that the testamentary guardian was in loco paternis; which quite supports the view above submitted.

In the case of Reynolds v. Lady Teynham (9 Mod. 42) the House of Lords overruled a decree in Chancery, taking the child, at the instance of the testamentary guardian, from the mother, and giving him to two persons appointed by him for the purpose of education. This was a decision the more remarkable, because the testamentary guardian was from age unable to act, and had specially selected two other persons as competent to follow out the father's will as to the child's education in a particular religion. The Court of Chancery had not appointed another person guardian; and non constat that the Court would have refused to appoint the mother; but the decree of the Court below was reversed, and the child was left with the mother. The ground given was, that the guardianship could not be assigned; and the principle, no doubt, was that repeatedly acted on by the great Chancellor, Lord Hardwicke, that the mother's right by survivorship is not to be interfered with, save so far as either the terms of the statute, or the danger of abuse to the infant, may require. Thus, in Mendez v. Mendez, (3 Atk. 629), Lord Hardwicke said, "The mother is guardian by nature," and intimated an impression, that the expression of the father's wish in his will, that she should have the care of the children, made her also testamentary guardian by statute. In Villareal v. Mellish, (2 Swanst. 533; 2 Atk. 15), Lord Hardwicke took the children of a Jew from their grandfather, a Jew, to the mother, (there being no testamentary guardian), although she had ceased to be a Jewess, declaring "that the father might have devised his right of guardianship, but that, not having done so, the right devolved to the mother; and the Court would not take the child from the mother unless when required to do so by the statute" —i. e. by the appointment of a testamentary guardian. So, in Roach v. Garvan (1 Ves. 158) and Smith v. Marshall, (2 Atk. 70), Lord Hardwicke said the surviving mother was guardian by nature. In Butler v. Freeman (Amb. 302) the same great judge laid it down, "that the Court would interfere, even as against a father, not on the footing of guardianship, but on the ground of the general right delegated by the Crown as pater patriæ in particular cases"—i. e. as he elsewhere explained, "in case of abuse to the infant's person or estate." So, there are cases, such as Ex parte Warner, (4 Bro. C. C. 101), in which the Court has taken the children from the father at the instance of the mother, as cases of immorality, &c. There are cases, again, like Lyon v. Blenkin, (Jac. 254), where the father has been held to waive his right of guardianship by voluntary acquiescence. In all these cases, where the Court acts as pater patriæ for the benefit of the infant, the ground of jurisdiction is the same in the case of the father as in that of the mother, and is regulated by the same principles. In no case, previous to the two cases we shall presently advert to, has the right of the mother as guardian been held to be displaced, save either by the superior statutable right of testamentary guardian, or by some definite danger of abuse to the person or estate of the infant, of the same nature as would lead the Court to interpose even against the father. In Talbot v. Shrewsbury (4 My. & C. 673) the mother was allowed to retain the child while he was under ten years, even from the testamentary guardian. In Re Spence (2 Ph. 247) the application was by the father against the relatives of the mother, who had absconded. There, no doubt, it was held that the jurisdiction of the Court was not confined to cases of property; but that must be taken with reference to applications by the father or the mother; or, if against either of them, it must be limited to cases in which, by the institution of a suit, an infant can be made a ward of Court, which, if it can be done at all by a stranger as against a parent, surely must be on the ground of abuse, or danger of abuse, to the person or estate of the infant. In Warde v. Warde (2 Ph. 786) the children were taken at her instance from the father, on the ground of immorality. In Ex parte Flynn (2 De G. & S. 457) a similar course was taken, in taking the children from an immoral father. In Wellesley v. Beaufort, (2 Russ. 1), where the same course was pursued, the House of Lords laid it down that the testamentary guardianship was a continuation of the paternal authority; which clearly implies, in conformity with the common law, that save so far as that authority is so continued by testament, it ceases with his death. That being so, any jurisdiction exercised against the mother must either be founded on abuse, or danger of abuse, as regards the infant's person or estate, or upon testamentary trust. The two grounds of jurisdiction are distinct, and indeed inconsistent. The latter has reference entirely to the father's will, and extends so far only as it is expressed. The former ground, as it gives jurisdiction even against the father during his life, is independent of his will after his death. It is not easy to see upon what principle the two cases of In re North (11 Jur. 7) and In re Race were decided; the former by Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, L. J., when Vice-Chancellor, and the latter by Sir R. T. Kindersley, V. C. In both cases the father was a Protestant. In the former case the wife, when he died, was a Protestant; in the latter a Roman Catholic. In the former case he left no will; in the latter he left a will, in which he expressed a hope that she would "do her duty as a mother," and also accompanied this with a letter expressly confiding the instruction of the children to her care. In both cases the children were taken from the mother, and confided to the care of strangers —of course against the will of the mother. In the former case there was no pretence of unfitness, and the only ground urged was, that the mother had become a Romanist. In the latter of the cases there was some attempt to impeach the character of the mother, but we understand the affidavits on that head were taken off the file, and that the decision went upon the same principle as In re North—that the father was a Protestant, and that the Court were bound to see that the children were brought up Protestants. Upon what principle? That is the question we find it difficult to solve. If on the principle of trust, and in carrying out the father's will, he had no power of carrying out that will, save by express testamentary trust, which in both cases was wanting; in the latter case, was in favour of the mother. The decision, then, in one case seems to do away with the necessity of the statute, and in the other case to do away with its efficacy. In the former case the father's will is pronounced to be enforced without any testament, in the latter case against it; for so far as he had expressed his intention, it was that the mother should bring up the children, which is hardly carried out by transferring them to the care of strangers. If the decisions are based on the ground of general control exercised by the Court as parens patriæ, for the benefit of the infant, as that proceeds upon no ground, as against the mother, which would not be valid as against the father, it should seem difficult to explain the application of that doctrine, except in the case of In re Race, possibly upon the ground of the mother's voluntary acquiescence for a year and a half in the child being educated by Protestants. But it has never yet been held that the bare permission to strangers to educate a child, without some permanent irrevocable provision being made, was enough to oust the right of parental guardianship; and in the present case there was no such provision until it was made pending the suit, and not then with the acquiescence of the mother. It has never before been held that the right of guardianship could be purchased, and that a colourable provision could be made the means of obtaining a locus standi in equity on a subject so delicate and so sacred. Altogether the case of In re Race (heard in private, and not reported) is not very reconcileable with the authorities, nor clearly referable to principle. Its having been heard in private makes it more desirable to direct attention to the cases; the more so, as we hear that the counsel for the mother did not argue the question of jurisdiction, (which we have dealt with). We observe, that in a case heard this week before the Lords Justices (Stourton v. Stourton) it has been argued that the religion of a Roman Catholic father must regulate the education of the child, the mother in that case having become a Protestant. We should say, in such a case, apart from express trust, that the mother could not be removed from the guardianship, save on the ground of some definite abuse; because, apart from abuse or express trust, her right by survivorship is as good as that of the father.

MERCANTILE-LAW CONFERENCE.—LAW OF BANKRUPTCY.

"Solicitors.

"The costs of the solicitor constitute the most serious item in the expense of every bankruptcy. In my court at Leeds, in the five years from January, 1843, the aggregate amount of costs was 26,471*l.*, or above 5000*l.* a year. From this it is easy to form an estimate of the sum paid in all the courts. It appears to me that the solicitor receives too much out of each bankrupt estate. This is not because he is overpaid for what he does, but because he does too much; that is, he does business which other people ought to do, and which is not properly within the province of a solicitor to meddle with. This arose in the following manner:—Before the year 1832 the solicitor applied to the Lord Chancellor for each commission of bankruptcy, and he had what was termed the carriage of the commission—that is, he had the custody of it, and the management and control of the whole of the business thereunder. In those days it was jocularly said that a commission of bankruptcy was the most valuable commission which the Crown could confer upon a subject. In those days the assignees left everything to the solicitor, who on his part was nothing loth to accept the charge, knowing that he would be amply remunerated for his pains. In fact, he did everything, and was well paid for everything he did. Now, however, the scene is, or ought to be, totally changed. To take care of a bankrupt estate we have commissioners, registrars, an accountant, a taxing master, an official assignee, a creditors' assignee, a messenger, and broker; and if these officers do their duty, all that remains for the solicitor is a little, and usually but a little, law business. Nevertheless, the solicitor still transacts, and is paid for, much that has no relation to the science of law. The result is, that far too large a proportion of the expenses of bankruptcy is caused by the solicitor's ordinary bill of costs. The table of averaged expenses which I have before quoted shews that very nearly one-third of the whole expenses of bankruptcy consists of the costs of the solicitor. Now for the remedy. I propose to appoint a solicitor to every court, whose duty would be to act as official solicitor under every bankruptcy, and to be paid a fixed salary of 400*l.* or 500*l.* a year, such salary to be paid out of the same fund as the other officers of the court. The experiment of the official assignee in place of the creditors' assignee has been found highly successful. I believe that an official solicitor would be no less successful. I do not propose that it should be imperative on the creditors to have recourse to the official solicitor. They should be allowed to select any other solicitor if they think fit; only, in that case, the dividend would be reduced by the amount of the bill of costs. I do not perceive that this measure would be unfairly injurious to the Profession. Other great public bodies have their official solicitors, who are remunerated by fixed salaries, and why not that commercial chamber the Court of Bankruptcy? It is to be remembered that all the costs of a bankruptcy are paid in reduction of a dividend to be made of an estate already insolvent. I have already suggested various reductions in different branches of the Court of Bankruptcy, and the solicitors will have no just reason to complain if they are included in the reduction.

"Proof of Debt.

"According to the existing practice, a creditor who desires to prove his debt must either attend the court personally, or transmit an affidavit. The trouble, loss of time, and expense consequent on attending personally is often considerable, and the affidavit costs a sum important to a poor man; it can scarcely be less than from 16*s.* to 1*l.* As no oath or affidavit is required under a deed of assignment, or in the Insolvent Debtors Court, I do not perceive the necessity for one in the Court of Bankruptcy. I therefore propose to abolish both oath and affidavit. In lieu thereof let the bankrupt, or in his absence the official assignee, prepare a list of creditors, and let the bankrupt swear to the truth of this list, and let this suffice, unless the debt be disputed or doubted, in which case the official assignee should write to the creditor informing him of that fact, and requesting him to attend personally to establish his debt. When the time arrives for payment of the dividend, the official assignee may send, by post, the dividend cheque, (or warrant, as it is termed), which should be indorsed with a printed form of receipt, to be signed by the creditor, ending somewhat to this effect—'I declare that the bankrupt is now indebted to me in the sum of £—— for goods sold and delivered to him before his bankruptcy, and that I have received no security or satisfaction for my debt;' and let signing this declaration be punished as for perjury if untrue, and accompanied by the forfeiture of twice the amount of the dividend.

"The Bankrupt's Balance-sheet.

"The balance-sheet, as it is termed, is a document which every bankrupt is compelled to file in court before he is allowed to pass his last examination; it ought to contain an account of his debts and property, and a statement of his income and expenditure for a certain period before his bankruptcy. In my opinion a radical change is required in the matter of the balance-sheet, as to its form, as to the person who prepares it, and as to the payment for its preparation. As regards the form of the balance-sheet, it is an elaborate document. This result has been brought about by leaving the preparation of balance-sheets in the hands of a particular class of professed accountants. We all know the state of perfection to which pleadings had been brought by the pleaders a few years ago; we all know the state to which bills and answers in Chancery have been brought by the equity draftsmen; we all know the state to which deeds of conveyance have been brought by the conveyancers; and what is the state to which the balance-sheet has been brought by the accountant? Why, it is a complete work of art, requiring a skilful connoisseur to recognise its beauties. It too frequently is a work of commercial poetry or invention. Not one merchant in a thousand can understand it. Indeed nobody can, save the accountants who prepare them, and the officers of the Court of Bankruptcy, who are ex officio bound to understand. The sober truth is, that in a great majority of instances balance-sheets are costly waste paper; they are complex in form, they tend to mislead, they seldom exhibit the truth, they are unintelligible to the many, and nearly useless to the few who understand them, or think they understand. Then as to the person who prepares it. Till very lately, by one of the fictions of law, it was supposed to be prepared by the bankrupt himself: now, by the Bankrupt Act of 1849, the commissioners are allowed to know that it is prepared by an accountant, who has to be paid. It is my opinion that a simple form of accounts ought, in all ordinary cases, to be prepared by the official assignee, or by the bankrupt himself with the assistance of the official assignee. The question as to the preparation of the balance-sheet by the official assignee is one which has been discussed. I must not trouble this meeting with the arguments pro and con. It is enough to say that Mr. Commissioner Fane tried it in his court, and approved of it. I tried it in my court, and in my opinion the experiment was quite successful. It was also tried in another court, but the practice was put a stop to by the Lords Justices, who disapproved of it.

“It appears to me that the complaint that the punishments inflicted upon bankrupts who offend against the laws of moral and mercantile honesty are inadequate and uncertain is a well-founded complaint. I submit that it should be a general principle, that in every case where a trader does not pay 10*s.* or 15*s.* in the pound, he ought to be considered and treated as an offender until he proves he is not one; that is, in other words, upon him should be cast the burthen of proving that his failure to pay 20*s.* in the pound is owing to circumstances over which he had no control. As the law now stands, the assignees are compelled to prove that the bankrupt has been guilty of some specified, definite offence; but this proof is always difficult, and not seldom impossible. Indeed, it may be stated roundly that a bankrupt can seldom be proved guilty of an offence unless he confesses it, or unless he has been wanting in sense as well as wanting in honesty. My opinion is, that a trader who pays less than 10*s.*, or perhaps 15*s.*, in the pound, ought not to have any sort of protection, or any certificate or other advantage from the Court of Bankruptcy, until he has proved that his insolvency is not owing to any gross default or immorality. If his failure and deficient assets are owing to circumstances over which he had no control, he will have not the slightest difficulty in proving such to be the case; whereas, on the other hand, the assignees might have the greatest possible difficulty in proving anything against the bankrupt, though they might entertain no moral doubt of his being a defaulter. With regard to particular offences, it appears to me that all the penal clauses of the Bankrupt Act require careful revision. One offence only will I refer to in particular—I mean bad bookkeeping. It appears to me that a heavy penalty should always be annexed where the bankrupt has not kept the best books which he could, taking into consideration his situation in life.

“ Appeals on Certificates.

“Before concluding this subject of punishment and this paper, I beg to say a few words with relation to a matter of some importance—that is, the present state of the appellate jurisdiction as regards bankrupts' certificates. The question of the amount of punishment to be inflicted by the Court of Bankruptcy generally arises on questions of granting, suspending, or refusing the certificate. It has been stated in a very public manner that an unfortunate difference of opinion exists between the Lords Justices and the Commissioners of the Court of Bankruptcy regarding the proper quantum of punishment to be affixed to different degrees of culpability in bankrupts applying for their certificates. No doubt it is the fact that on appeals the Lords Justices generally alter and modify the sentence of the commissioners, almost invariably reducing the quantum of punishment. But it will be asked, how can it be said with any propriety that a difference of opinion can exist between the commissioners and the Court of Appeal, seeing that it is the duty of the inferior tribunal to bow to the decisions of the Court of Appeal? It will at once be perceived that this is a difficult and delicate question to touch upon; but I think I may venture to state, as a general proposition, that in many of the appeals the Lords Justices have so differed from the commissioners on questions, sometimes of principle, sometimes of detail, of such a nature that the judgment of the one or the other must be fundamentally wrong on questions of common mercantile life and morals. The result appears to be, that in order to maintain that feeling of respect which ought to accompany every tribunal for the administration of justice, one of two things ought to take place—either the whole question of the certificate must be taken from the commissioner and transferred to the Lords Justices, or the appeal on questions of certificate must be abolished, and the decision left with the commissioner. As regards the first plan, it is tolerably certain that the Lords Justices would never tolerate the wearying labour of deciding in the first instance concerning bankrupts' certificates; even if their Lordships felt inclined to undertake the task, it is very doubtful whether they could possibly find the time; and if they could, still arises the question whether the public would endure the expense of taking all the country cases to London; and, finally, would their Lordships' decisions be satisfactory, seeing that the whole case up to that time had been before another tribunal? The result appears to me that the appeal on questions of certificate only ought to be abolished. But in leaving the decision in the hands of the commissioners alone, it must be remembered that lawyers are not born with any peculiar aptitude to judge of commercial matters; and their legal education and professional pursuits go very little way towards supplying what, like all other men, they have to learn upon the subject. Skill and knowledge on such matters are the slow growth of time and experience. The commissioner, sitting daily, attending daily to commercial matters, surrounded by men in trade and by solicitors connected with merchants, may be supposed in time to gain some portion of experience in commercial matters. But in order to guard the public against any erroneous views which the commissioner may take—he being, of course, liable to infirmity of judgment, exposed to mistakes, and, to take the worst possible view, even subject to caprices, all of which must be guarded against—the remedy will be to require that on questions of the last examination, or of certificates, if any of the parties (that is, the bankrupt, the assignees, or any opposing creditor) shall require it, two commercial men of the district—members of the chamber of commerce, if possible—not connected with the bankruptcy, but of the same trade as the bankrupt, shall sit with the commissioners, having a voice and vote in the determination of the case. With this guard, the appeal to the Lords Justices on such questions might be abolished with safety and advantage to all parties. That something should be done is clear. The habitual reversal or alteration by the Court of Appeal of the decisions of the commissioners—those frequent collisions of opinion about matters of common commercial life—must needs damnify one of the courts. I have just given judgment in a case which strongly illustrates the necessity of the assistance of commercial men. For two years past two partners, wool spinners, have been before me. Several of the principal creditors, and also the assignees, contend that the bankrupts have not accounted for, and have therefore concealed upwards of, 40,000lbs. weight of wool. On the one hand, a skilful accountant examined the bankrupts' books, and stated that he found this deficiency; on the other hand, the bankrupts brought forward a no less skilful accountant, who also examined the same books, and arrived at exactly the contrary conclusion, stating that the deficiency was or might be accounted for by waste of various kinds. It appeared to me that the bankrupts had been guilty of concealment, and I refused the certificates. Against the decision the bankrupts have appealed. Now, it would have been in the highest degree satisfactory to me to have had the assistance of some gentlemen connected with wool spinning, who would have known exactly what questions to put to the witnesses, and who would have known what weight to allow to their evidence, and who, from themselves inspecting the books and bringing their own knowledge to bear on the subject, would have been able to form a good opinion as to whether the alleged loss by waste really took place. But an appeal is gone to the Lords Justices. Among the questions which they will have to decide will be, whether this or that lot of wool has been fairly worked up and sold, or whether so many ounces per pound have or have not been wasted in the manufacture of this or that particular lot of wool. Can their Lordships trace 40,000lbs. weight of wool through a wool spinner's books any better than the commissioner could? If, therefore, the appeal is to continue to the Lords Justices, I think their Lordships ought to have associated with them on such occasions one or two mercantile men, in the same manner as I have suggested for the commissioner."

BILL IN PROGRESS.

Bill to prevent vexatious Litigation.

For preventing vexatious proceedings at law and in equity, be it enacted &c. as follows:—

Sect. 1. It shall be lawful for any person who hath or shall have any claim or demand against any other person, either at law or in equity, in respect of any debt, or matter in the nature of debt, or any land or other property, or any wrong, or any other matter of any kind whatever, to cite the person against whom he has or shall have such claim or demand to appear before a judge of the court having jurisdiction in the matter, to have the matter in dispute, or which may come into dispute, between the parties heard and advised upon by the said judge, which hearing and advice shall be called "Proceeding for Reconcilement;" and such judge shall appoint the times when and the places where he may please to sit and hold his court of reconcilement: provided that such court of reconcilement shall be holden by the judge of every county court constituted under the act of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, at a convenient time during or after the ordinary sittings of the said judge in each place within his jurisdiction, notice being previously given thereof in some newspaper circulating within his jurisdiction.

2. The party citing shall first obtain leave from the said judge to come before him at the time and place to be named in the citation, and shall serve the citation on the other party two weeks at least before the said time of appearance; and the citation shall state shortly the matter of the claim or demand which the person citing hath against the other party, with the time and place whereat the judge is to sit and hear and advise in the matter.

3. The party so cited shall, at his own election, appear or not before the said judge; but he shall within one week after being so cited serve the party citing with a notice, in which notice he shall state whether he intends to appear or not; and such notice, with the proof of service of citation, may be given in evidence against the party cited, in any suit at law or in equity which may be brought by the party citing, for the purpose of proving that the party cited refused to appear before the judge in a court of reconcilement, which refusal may be taken into consideration in regard to costs in all cases where the costs, or any part thereof, are in the discretion of the court before which such suit shall come.

4. When the party citing has received notice from the other party that he intends to appear, he shall give notice thereof to the clerk of the judge five days before the time appointed for hearing and advising; and the parties shall at such appointed time appear personally, and without any attorney or counsel, before the said judge; and if either party fail to appear he shall pay reasonable costs to the other party appearing, to be taxed by the clerk, and to be levied in like manner as costs are levied according to the practice of the court to which such judge belongs; and if neither party shall attend, and neither shall give three days' notice of intending not to attend, both parties shall pay such reasonable fine as the judge shall impose, to be levied in like manner.

5. When the parties appear before the said judge he shall hear them state the matters of their respective claims or demands, and defences or answers, in the presence of each other, and shall give them his opinion and advice thereupon, and it shall be in their option to follow and abide by this advice or not, as they shall think fit; and in case they shall agree to abide by such advice, the substance thereof shall be reduced into writing by a memorandum, which shall be signed by the parties, and entered in a book of the clerk, to be called "the Reconcilement Book;" and such memorandum shall be final and binding on the said parties, and shall have the effect of a covenant under seal in all courts whatever, and an examined copy thereof may be given in evidence; and the party to whom any sum of money is by such memorandum agreed to be paid shall have execution, as in the case of a judgment in an action or suit before the said judge for such sum, against the party agreeing to pay, and not paying it at the time agreed upon in such memorandum; but if a party shall have agreed to do any other thing, and shall fail to do it, the other party shall not have execution, but shall and may sue upon such memorandum of agreement, and for breach of it, as upon a covenant under seal, and for breach of such covenant: provided always, that it shall be lawful for the said judge before whom the parties shall have appeared, after he shall have heard and advised upon the matter by them stated, to adjourn, if he think fit, the further consideration thereof to the next sitting of the court of reconcilement, at which sitting the said parties, if they attend, may declare whether or not they are minded to abide by his advice.

6. When any parties shall have been heard in any matter before any judge of a county court as aforesaid sitting in a court of reconcilement, and either of the said parties shall sue the other upon the same matter before the said judge by way of action, such party shall annex to his statement a notice, to be filed with the clerk along with the said statement, that the cause of action is some matter already heard before the said judge; and if the party suing shall omit to annex such notice, the party sued may annex it to his answer; and the clerk of such judge, upon such notice being so annexed by either party, shall make out a certificate of the matter thereof, whereupon the proceedings before the said judge shall cease, and the matter of the said suit shall and may be carried before a judge of some adjoining county, notwithstanding that the party sued shall not reside therein, anything in this act, or in the act of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding; and the costs incurred by beginning the proceedings before the first-mentioned judge shall be costs in the cause.

7. The defendant in any action at law or suit in equity may, after having appeared to the writ of summons, writ in ejectment, bill, or claim, make application to any judge of the court for an order to stay proceedings until the plaintiff or one of the plaintiffs shall give security for the payment of the defendant's costs; and the said judge shall, if he thinks fit, summon the plaintiff or plaintiffs to appear and shew cause why such order to such process should not be made.

8. If the plaintiff or plaintiffs do not appear upon such summons, or if the judge upon hearing both parties is satisfied, regard being had to the nature of the action or suit and the circumstances of the plaintiff or plaintiffs, that security for the defendant's costs ought to be given, he may, if he thinks fit, order further proceedings to be stayed until the plaintiff or one of the plaintiffs give such security.

9. It is declared and enacted, that the powers given to the court, commissioners, or justices, by sect. 78 of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, and to every court having jurisdiction in matters of insolvency by any act now in force, may be exercised by them in cases where the prisoner shall have been taken in execution for the costs of a vexatious or frivolous suit or action brought by him, as well as for the costs occasioned by any vexatious or frivolous defence or delay to any suit or action.

Life Department.—Under the provisions of an act of Parliament, this Company now offers to future Insurers Four-fifths of the Profits, with Quinquennial Division, or a Low Rate of Premium without participation of Profits.

The next Division of Profits will be declared in June, 1860, when all Participating Policies which shall have subsisted at least one year at Christmas, 1859, will be allowed to share in the Profits.

At the five Divisions of Profits made by this Company, the total Reversionary Bonuses added to the Policies have exceeded 913,000*l.*

At Christmas, 1854, the Assurances in force amounted to upwards of 4,240,000*l.*, the Income from the Life Branch in 1854 was more than 200,000*l.*, and the Life Assurance Fund (independent of the Guarantee Capital) exceeded 1,700,000*l.*

Foreign Risks.—The Extra Premiums required for the East and West Indies, the British Colonies, and the northern parts of the United States of America, have been materially reduced.

Invalid Lives.—Persons who are not in such sound health as would enable them to Insure their Lives at the Tabular Premiums may have their Lives Insured at extra Premiums.

Loans granted on Life Policies to the extent of their values, provided such Policies shall have been effected a sufficient time to have attained in each case a value not under 50*l.*

Assignments of Policies—Written Notices of, received and registered.

Medical fees paid by the Company, and no charge will be made for Policy Stamps.

Fire Department.—Insurances are effected upon every description of property at moderate rates.

CAUTION.—TO TRADESMEN, MERCHANTS, SHIPPERS, OUTFITTERS, &c.

WHEREAS it has lately come to my knowledge that some unprincipled person or persons have for some time past been imposing upon the public, by selling to the Trade and others a spurious article under the name of BOND'S PERMANENT MARKING INK; this is to give Notice, that I am the original and sole Proprietor and Manufacturer of the said Article, and do not employ any traveller, or authorise any persons to represent themselves as coming from my establishment, for the purpose of selling the said Ink. This Caution is published by me to prevent further imposition upon the public, and serious injury to myself.

E. R. BOND, Sole Executrix and Widow of the late John Bond, 28, Long-lane, West Smithfield, London.

 To avoid disappointment from the substitution of counterfeits, be careful to ask for the genuine Bond's Permanent Marking Ink; and further to distinguish it, observe that NO SIXPENNY SIZE is or has at any time been prepared by him, the Inventor and Proprietor.

 Orders for THE JURIST given to any Newsman, or letter (post-paid) sent to the Office, No. 3, CHANCERY LANE, or to STEVENS & NORTON, 26, BELL YARD, LINCOLN'S INN, will insure its punctual delivery in London, or its being forwarded on the evening of publication, through the medium of the Post Office, to the Country.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, MARCH 7, 1857.

The correspondent who wrote the article upon "Guardianship in Chancery," in our last number, has favoured us with these further observations on the same subject:—

The Lords Justices have taken time to consider their decision in Stourton v. Stourton, and the importance of the question raised now appears to be fully recognised. That question is, whether in Chancery, as at common law, the mother, surviving the father, is not guardian by nature and for nurture—i. e. for education and maintenance—subject to be displaced on special grounds. The bill in Stourton v. Stourton lays no special grounds; it states that the infant has personal estate, and it prays that a proper person or persons may be appointed guardian, and that directions may be given as to the infant's education and maintenance. No special grounds being laid, the question is whether the mother can be displaced. The real reason of the application was disclosed on the argument—that the father was a Roman Catholic, and that the mother has become a Protestant; and it is said that this gives the Court jurisdiction to take the child from her, or to deprive her of all interference in his education—i. e. in either case to ignore her common-law right as guardian for nurture. Can the Court of Chancery do that? If so, on what principle?

The question is as to the right of the mother as guardian for nurture (i. e. for education) on the death of the father, in the absence of testamentary guardian; and it is one of such interest and importance that it could scarcely be disposed of in a single article, and we therefore return to the subject, especially as it is still pending in Chancery. At common law the guardian in chivalry could claim custody of the heir's person as against the mother, on the obvious ground that she could not be competent to conduct the military education of the child, on which his tenure of his lands, held by feudal tenure, at full age, would depend. This gives the clue to the whole jurisdiction of equity on the subject, which we contend is restricted to moral, social, and legal grounds, and cannot be exercised on grounds spiritual or theological. The guardian in chivalry had no right to the person unless the lands were held in chivalry; nor had the Crown, unless the king was immediate lord. Guardianship in socage applied when lands not held in chivalry descended; and this was distinct from the mother's guardianship by nurture. Yet we are not aware of any authority to shew that the guardian in socage could claim the custody of the child from the mother under the age of fourteen; while the case in 9 Edw. 4 is an authority that he could not do so; and per Littleton, J., "Guardianship by nurture can be where no lands are descendible." Moreover, there is a case in the Year Book, 30 Edw. 3, in which the father and mother were held entitled to sue out a writ of ravishment of ward, though he had no lands descendible ex parte maternâ; which of course shews that she, surviving the father, could sue alone. In perfect conformity with the principle of the old law as to disparagement was the case of Eyre v. Shaftesbury, (2 P. Wms. 103), where the Court went entirely on the analogies derivable from the ancient writs and cases at common law. Be it observed, that this question of guardianship is a common-law question, (apart from testamentary trust), and was decided at common law on writs of right of guardianship. Before the stat. 12 Car. 2, giving the father the right of appointing a testamentary guardian, the right of guardianship for nurture would clearly survive to the mother in all cases of tenure by socage, or cases in which no lands were descendible. That statute applies now to all cases, including such as would before the act have been cases of guardianship in chivalry, like the case of the heir of Lord Shaftesbury; and the equity or principle of those cases, no doubt, thus far remains, and has ever since been enforced by the Crown in Chancery as parens patriæ, as no doubt it would have been before the statute, had there been any necessity for it, in all cases of tenure in chivalry, viz. the principle of protecting the heir from disparagement, or from any education derogatory to his father's station or rank in society. There was no necessity for the exercise of jurisdiction on the part of the Crown under the feudal system, because it was the manifest interest of the lord to see that the heirs of his military tenants were duly educated. Lord Coke describes the duty of guardian in chivalry in terms which we say embrace all the grounds of the jurisdiction in Chancery at this day, apart from testamentary trust, that duty being "to educate the ward virtuously," and to prevent him from "disparagement."

We question very much whether it be competent to the father, even by express testamentary trust, to bind the conscience of the mother to educate the child in a particular religion, which, on legal, moral, and social grounds, is only on a parity with the religion of the father. The case of Lady Teynham, (9 Mod. 42), in which there was such an express testamentary trust to bring up the child as a Protestant, was under the penal laws; and how far they necessarily affected the legal aspect of the question is apparent from this, that they involved social and legal disabilities, extending even to a forfeiture of estate. Even under those circumstances the House of Lords declared, that though bound to take the child from the mother to give it to the testamentary guardian, they would not take it from her to give it to a stranger, even at the appointment of the testamentary guardian. And Lord Hardwicke laid it down, (Roach v. Garvan, 1 Ves. sen. 158), that "the mother is guardian by nature and for nurture where there is no testamentary guardian; and the Court will not remove her except where there is misbehaviour." (Villareal v. Mellish, 2 Swanst. 533; 2 Atk. 15; Mendez v. Mendez, 3 Atk. 629; Smith v. Marshall, 2 Atk. 70). It is questionable whether, even by express testamentary trust, the father, leaving her guardian, can bind her conscience to bring up the child in a particular religion. How can a court of conscience enforce a trust contrary to conscience? And as the mother and father are, according to the common law, joint tenants of the wardship, even though there be no lands ex parte maternâ, how can one joint tenant fetter the other by a trust contrary to the nature of the joint interest? The statute gives the power of removing her from the guardianship; but the question arises when that is not done.

We have shewn that the Crown is not guardian, where there is already a legal guardian. We have shewn that the greatest equity authorities recognised the mother as guardian, except as against a testamentary guardian by statute. In Lady Teynham's case (9 Mod. 42*) the House of Lords held that the Court of Chancery could transfer the child from the mother to the testamentary guardian, but not to his appointee; à multo fortiori not to a stranger; yet in that case the object was to carry out the father's express will that the child was to be brought up a Protestant. In Villareal v. Mellish, (2 Swanst. 533), Lord Hardwicke refused to take a child from the mother merely because she had changed her religion from that of the father. We cited several cases in which he declared the mother guardian by nature, and that her right was not to be interfered with save under a statutable testament. In any case in which, even under such compulsion, it has been interfered with, as by Lord Eldon in Lady Ilchester's case, (7 Ves. 380), it has been done with the utmost tenderness and reluctance. Even in the case of a natural child, if any one is mentioned in the testament she would be appointed guardian without reference. (Chatteris v. Young, 1 J. & W. 106). Where the mother is not appointed guardian by the testament, we repeat, her right is disturbed with infinite reluctance. (Talbot v. Shrewsbury, 4 My. & C. 673). And there is no case in which any one else has been arbitrarily appointed guardian while she survives; nor can the guardian be removed except on special ground. (Ingham v. Beckerdike, 6 Mad. 275). In the case of Mr. Wellesley, in the House of Lords, it was laid down that testamentary guardianship is a continuation of the paternal authority, (Wellesley v. Beaufort, 2 Russ. 1); and of course the father's right prevails against the mother where it is asserted by him. But the question is as to where it is not asserted by him; and, we repeat, there is no case in which, while she survives, any other person has been arbitrarily appointed guardian in her place—that is to say, guardian of the person, or for education—so as to supersede her authority as guardian for nurture. In Beattie v. Johnston, (7 Cl. & Fin.), before the House of Lords, the mother had died. So, in Re Hunt, (2 Con. & L. 371), where Lord St. Leonards took the child from friends of hers to whom she had confided it, but did so on several grounds, not one of which was referable to the mere simple fact that the deceased mother's friends were of a different religion from that of the father. It is true that Lord St. Leonards dwelt much on the fact that they were of a new sect, the "Plymouth Brethren;" but he spoke of them in a way which shewed that his objection to them did not arise solely from the simple fact that their religion was not the father's: he rather dwelt on the fact that they were a new-fangled body, of whom he could not know "whether they had any regular clergy or established discipline." And we cannot admit that this class of cases can at all justify the withdrawal of the child of a Romanist from a mother who is a member of the Established Church, or the converse case of the withdrawal of the child of a member of the Church of England from a Romanist mother, or a

* By error we stated last week that the child was left with the mother. The child was given to the testamentary guardian, according to one report. The Court could not give it to any one else. And that was the point.

Presbyterian child from an Episcopalian; and so of the Episcopalians and the "Protestant dissenters"—bodies recognised by law and referred to in statutes. A century ago Lord Henley repudiated with indignation the idea of applying the latter term, "Protestant dissenters," to all the sects of fanatics which arose, and have so multiplied since his time. The class of cases in which an infant has been withdrawn from parents belonging to such sects, surely, should be referred rather to the principle that the Crown in Chancery has jurisdiction to protect infants from what at common law was called "disparagement," or, in the more modern language of Courts of equity, "danger of abuse to the person or education"—i. e. where there is a likelihood that the infant will be brought up in a way derogatory to its proper position in society. It is true that in the case cited Lord St. Leonards said that the mother, while she lived, would have been bound by an implied trust to bring up the child in the religion of the father; but as she was dead, that was clearly obiter, because she cannot appoint a testamentary guardian. The interposition in that case was on the general power of the Court as pater patriæ—a jurisdiction always exercised with reference to the benefit of the infant. Now, when the mother's religion, or the religious community she belongs to, cannot be objected to per se, or by reason of any derogatory associations to which it may expose the infant, that cannot be the ground of jurisdiction; and accordingly in that class of cases Lord St. Leonards clearly puts the interposition of the Court on its only possible basis, that of trust. But the statute which gives power to appoint a testamentary guardian gives indirectly the power of securing the instruction of the child in the religion of the father. Indirectly; for though in Talbot v. Shrewsbury (4 My. & C. 2) the Lord Chancellor said that the father had no absolute right to direct what the religion of the child should be after his death; in the same case it was said, that the selection of a guardian of a particular religion would indicate an intention that the child should be brought up in that religion; and next, the testament may create an express trust for that purpose, which in such case equity can enforce, as in that case it did. And so in Re Brown, (2 Ir. Eq. Rep., N. S., 151), where the mother was dead, and the contest was between the testamentary guardian and her relatives; and the Court enabled the former to carry out the directions of the testament as to the child's religious instruction. But in cases of infants the jurisdiction of the Court as to trust is affected by that which is its cardinal principle in cases of guardianship—a regard for the benefit of the infant; and even in cases of express trust, by testament, for the infant's instruction in a particular religion, the Court has declined to enforce it where laches has made it likely that the result of enforcing the education in a particular religion would be morally injurious to the infant. (Witty v. Marshall, 1 Y. & C. C. C. 68). Upon the same principle it should seem to follow that it might be argued forcibly, that where there is no express trust for the infant's education in a particular religion, and there is a mother surviving, her guardianship should not (save on the ground of abuse or "disparagement" already referred to) be interfered with, merely for the sake of securing education in the religion of the father; especially considering that in the recent case of Warde v. Warde, (2 Ph. 786), the Chancellor, on the one hand, laid it down that children were entitled by law to the care of their mother as well as father; and, on the other hand, that it was to be desired not to introduce factions into families. There seems something shocking to common feeling and common sense in taking a child from its surviving parent, the mother, merely because she is not of the same form of the Christian religion as the father, he having forborne to create any express trust for the child's instruction in it. At common law he could not do so; and his authority expires with his life. He can only continue it by testament under the statute, and does not do so. Either he leaves the mother guardian by his will, or he simply says nothing about guardianship in it. In the latter case—and every man must be presumed to know the law—it must be taken that he means her to be guardian. In either case, to insist on the child being brought up in his religion is to insist on what he forbore to demand; very likely from that fear of introducing "faction into his family" which Lord Cottenham expressed; non constat, any how, that he desired the object so much that he would sacrifice to it the mutual affections of the mother and the child. And it seems impossible to escape from the conclusion, that as he has not declared a trust, it is for the benefit of the infant that he has not done so, unless the Court of Chancery is to make itself arbiter of different religions, and to undertake to determine which is for the benefit of the infant. Spiritually or theologically, it certainly does not affect to do so; and morally, socially, or domestically, we should say, that it is "for the benefit of the child" that during infancy it should be brought up in the mother's religion, provided it is one which holds the great doctrines of Christianity, and has a regular recognised system of instruction. It has been laid down, in terms, that a mother ought to have a share in directing the education of her child, (Fermor v. Pomfret, 1 Jur., part 1, p. 150)—a proposition certainly accordant with the dictates of nature and the precepts of Christianity. We desire to distinguish between displacing a mother as guardian of the person and education, and merely associating with her some other guardians of the estate—a distinction dictated by obvious convenience, and in accordance with the civil law. But the mischief and the vice of the doctrine, that the father's religion must necessarily regulate that of the child during infancy, is this—that it necessitates the virtual removal of the mother from the guardianship, unless she is to be forced to the insincerity of teaching a religion she does not believe in. Surely it is a fearful thing to expose maternal affection to such a temptation; and the doctrine in question infallibly involves hypocrisy in the mother, or cruelty towards the mother. It is impossible to carry out the principle without excluding her from the society of her children, or precluding her from speaking to them on the subject of religion. Unnatural prohibition! In the case of In re North (11 Jur., part 1, p. 7) that was the course taken. What anguish it must have involved to the mother; perhaps greater than if she had been wholly separated from them; but, in that case, what agony to them! Now, all this is to be done by the Court as parens patriæ! Domestic misery unutterable, inflicted in the name of parental tenderness and parental care! What a mockery it does seem! Again: the separation of the child from the mother, for the sake of his education in a particular religion, is the likeliest course to prejudice him against that religion. In the case of In re North the mother had changed her religion since the father's death; but that was in accordance with the sacred rights of conscience. And so in Mrs. Stourton's case; and the converse case can easily be conceived of the father changing his religion after marriage. Better follow the law of God, that a child is to honour his surviving parent, and leave the result to Providence. In the case of In re North, be it observed, the mother had voluntarily parted with her children until they were ten or eleven years of age, and then wanted to regain them merely on account of her own change of religion. That is not quite the same case as that of a mother who, like Mrs. Stourton, had never parted with her child, and whom it is sought to deprive of her child, on the ground of her change in religion. And there is a broad distinction between declining to appoint a mother guardian in Chancery, (i. e. an officer of the Court), when she applies for that appointment, and displacing her from her common-law right of guardianship on the application of other parties. In the case of In re North, however, it is proper to say that it is doubtful whether the decision must necessarily be referred to the doctrine we protest against, and whether it might not be supported, on the principle of a large class of cases, as to voluntary acquiescence on the part of the parent, and her inability to provide for the infants according to the education she had allowed to be made for them; and if that be so, then the opinion of Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, V. C., in favour of the doctrine in question was obiter. It is fair to add, that it was not efficiently argued on that point, none of the authorities we rely on having been cited; while in the case of In re Race the question of jurisdiction was not argued at all. Strange to say, therefore, the question has never been distinctly discussed; and we trust that it may be satisfactorily settled in Stourton v. Stourton. There is this obvious difficulty in the doctrine against which we have argued, that it tends to make the Court of Chancery a court of theology. Where is the line to be drawn, as regards difference of religion? Is the distinction between Trinitarian and Unitarian of less importance than that between Romanist and Anglican? or Episcopalian and Presbyterian, or Independent and Baptist, or Baptist and Pædo-Baptist, or General Baptist and Particular Baptist, or Methodist and Primitive Methodist, or Wesleyan and Whitfield or Lady Huntingdon Connexion Methodists? Where, we say, is the line to be drawn? The Romanists, the Anglicans, the Presbyterians, the Protestant dissenters, it may be said, are in many ways recognised by law. That may make a social and legal distinction as regards other and less regular or unrecognised sects; but does it not also destroy all legal distinction among those different religious bodies which are thus recognised in our courts? Are they not, legally, socially, and morally, on a par? And if so, how can the Court of Chancery enter into theological distinctions between them, as an Ecclesiastical Court might do, on a question of soundness of doctrine or right to ordination, and create a positive trust, under cover of which to destroy a sacred right, established by common law, recognised in Chancery, and conformable to reason, to nature, and to Christianity?

Our readers will probably remember that in the article which we devoted to the queries of our correspondent "H." on the subject of the recent Joint-stock Companies Act we were obliged to leave some unanswered, and to those we now invite attention. The points in doubt relate to the position of companie, already existing at the time of the passing of the acts which have been brought under its operation by registration; and the most convenient course will be to state in the first instance the general view which we take of the sections of the act, and then to draw attention in detail to the particular points in doubt.

The fifth part of the act is headed "Repeal of former acts and temporary provisions," and the sections in question are again headed "Temporary provisions;" so that we are at once advertised of the fact that the general legislation is done with, and that we are about to deal with particular provisions. We should, therefore, from the previous part of the statute, from its consolidating character, expect to find that it would deal with already existing companies, so as to prevent or destroy, as far as possible, any distinction between them and the new companies, and that, saving existing rights, they would at once be brought within the operation of the new system. Accordingly we find the 110th section enacting, that "every company under the old Joint-stock Companies Act" shall, on or before the 3rd November, 1856, and any other lawful company may, register itself as a company under the new act. Then the 111th and 112th sections provide certain requisitions for the registration of such companies, upon compliance with which the registrar is to give a certificate of incorporation, (sect. 113), and thereupon the company is incorporated; and then the section continues, "all provisions contained in any deed of settlement, act of Parliament, royal charter, or letters-patent, or other instrument constituting or regulating the company, shall be deemed to be regulations of the company within the meaning of this act; and all the provisions of this act shall apply to such company in the same manner in all respects as if it had been originally incorporated under this act."

Subsequently there is a proviso, that except as to a change of name, "no company constituted by act of Parliament, and no company constituted by royal charter or letters-patent, shall have power, by special resolution or otherwise, to alter any of the provisions contained in such charter or letters-patent without the consent of the Board of Trade." Now, the general intention of this would seem to be pretty clear. First, companies which now exist under a self-imposed constitution shall absolutely, and without qualification, except as to vested rights, become subject to the new system as soon as they are registered. Secondly, companies under a constitution given to them by the Crown or Legislature shall differ from the new companies in one respect—they shall still be subject to the control of the Crown as to change of constitution.

This being the presumed general intention, let us see how far it has been carried into effect, and consider whether any of the first class of companies is enabled to alter any of its regulations by special resolution, under the provisions of the 33rd section. Now, if it be not, it is in a worse position than the second class of companies, which can do so by the leave of the Board of Trade, to which no such power is given, either expressly or by implication, with reference to the first class. Therefore it would seem that this consideration is of itself sufficient to dispose of the question in favour of such power. But, in addition to this, the deeds of companies under the old act were stuffed with rules for their regulation utterly inconsistent with the provisions of this act. Moreover, the 7th section of the old act provided, "that any defect or omission, as regards the matters thereby required in any deed of settlement, might from time to time be supplied by a supplementary deed or deeds." That provision is gone, and those defects and omissions would have to remain if the power of alteration be taken away from such companies—a conclusion so absurd that it could not be supported except by express words. We therefore say, without hesitation, that the 33rd section does apply to the companies in question.

The next question suggested by our correspondent is, whether, in the case of such companies registered anew under this act, the operation of Table (B.) is effectually excluded, or whether those regulations govern the company, subject to the deed of settlement. The 9th section gives power to the promoters of any company, if they consider the regulations in Table (B.) as inapplicable in their case, to exclude them, in whole or in part, by annexing to the memorandum of association articles signed by the subscribers of the memorandum, prescribing regulations for the company; and it declares, that if no such regulations are prescribed, or so far as the same do not extend to modify the regulations in Table (B.), the latter regulations shall, so far as the same are applicable, be deemed to be regulations of the company, and as binding as if inserted in the articles. Then it is said, that as sect. 113 constitutes the provisions of the deed of settlement, or other instrument regulating any existing company, regulations of the company when re-registered, and does not say the regulations, it will follow that the operation of Table (B). is not excluded, and that the regulations of such company will be a sort of patchwork combination between its old deed and Table (B.), viz. so far as the former does not modify the latter. Now, it may be observed at once, that nothing could be more ridiculous or anomalous than this. The object of the statute is clearly to give companies power to manage their own affairs and to make their own rules. Newly-formed companies, not yet having any system or code of management, may entirely repudiate Table (B.), and, right or wrong, may say—"This does not suit us; we will not risk the uncertainty of having a set of rules modified by those in Table (B.), but will exclude it altogether, and have a set which shall be a consistent whole." What, then, could be more absurd than to say to already existing companies, which have to a certain extent chosen their system, tried it, proved it, and made it consistent, "We will force upon you these regulations, as modified by your deed, until you find out the inconveniences of the combination, and remove them by special resolution?" And if the effect of this combination should in any case be injurious, it is an injury which, upon this hypothesis, the company could not entirely prevent, because any alteration must be by special resolution, which could not take place until months after the registration of the company, during which time great injury might have accrued. Surely the meaning of the Legislature is this—"You who would form new companies may prescribe your own rules by your articles; and if you do not, here is a code which, to prevent difficulty, shall apply. You old companies, who have already made your rules, shall continue with those rules until you think fit to alter them in the usual way." We confess to a suspicion that the word "the" was omitted in the 113th section by some mistake, or else that it was omitted to meet the very difficulty involved in the point first discussed, and lest it should be said, that as the act had made the deed of settlement "the regulations" of the company, there was no power to alter them. But without this, it seems to us that those who consider that Table (B.) is not excluded in these cases are in this difficulty—either sect. 9 applies to such companies, or it does not. If it does, there are regulations prescribed for them, viz. their deeds of settlement; if it does not, cadit quæstio; there is nothing to make Table (B.) apply to them, and therefore, quâ cunque viâ, it is excluded. The last point raised does not seem to present any doubt; it is, whether a shareholder, becoming such subsequently to the re-registration of the company, ought to execute the deed of settlement, and whether he would be bound by it without such execution. The answer to this is, that when any old company comes under the operation of this act, there ceases to be any deed of settlement as such, but the deed takes the place of articles of association; and for this purpose the position of shareholders seems to be precisely the same as if the company were a new one, and had had all the provisions of that deed annexed, as articles, to the memorandum of association. The necessity for the execution of the deed of settlement was caused by the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, s. 3, which gave, as a definition of a shareholder, "one who is entitled to a share, and who has executed the deed of settlement, or a deed referring thereto;" and it is therefore clear that there will be in this case no such necessity. Possibly there may be a difference in the position of the old and new shareholders with respect to the nature of the debt created by a call, which in the former case may still continue, as regards the company, a specialty debt, but in the latter not so. This distinction, however, would be of very minor importance. While upon this set of clauses, perhaps it may be convenient to call attention to the last section, (sect. 116), saving the rights of creditors. That section enacts, "that the re-registration of a company shall not, nor shall any subsequent act of the company, prejudice any right which previously to such registration has, or which would if no such registration had taken place have, accrued to any creditor or other person against the company in its corporate capacity, or against any person then being or having been a member of such company; but every such creditor or other person shall be entitled to all such remedies against the company in its corporate capacity, and against every person then being or having been a member of such company, as he would have been entitled to in case no such registration had taken place." What does this mean? What are the rights which would have accrued to any person "if no such registration had taken place," which would be hindered by such registration? The section seems to have been framed upon the supposition that a corporation, by change of name or constitution, loses its rights and is discharged from its engagements. That such is the case where a corporation is dissolved is clear; that it is not the case where it merely receives a new charter or constitution is equally clear. (The Mayor of Scarborough v. Butler, 3 Lev. 238; Luttrel's case, 4 Rep. 87; Mellor v. Spateman, 1 Saund. 343; Colchester v. Seaber, 1 W. Bl. 591). The company here is the same corporate body, the same person, and having the same rights and liabilities with reference to all by-gone transactions, and therefore to all rights in process of accrual. There are, then, no rights which would be affected by "registration" in its ordinary sense. Are we to give the word a more extended sense, and read the passage "as if this act had not passed?" Then the effect will be to continue in force all the old provisions for scire facias and execution against shareholders which existed under the old act, so far as this section applies, for the latter part of the section saves all remedies. The "rights which would have accrued" are of course rights accruing subsequently to such registration. The words are not clearly confined to rights springing out of matters which arose before the registration; but that must be the case, because the section is only a temporary provision, of limited duration; and otherwise the section would apply to all rights, of whatever kind, which cannot be intended. It is difficult to know to what period to refer the word "then," but it seems to have reference to the time of the accrual of the right; and the effect of the section will then be, omitting all the early part as meaningless, to preserve to all persons who had dealings with the company prior to the registration the remedies of the old act in respect of rights arising out of those prior dealings. It will be observed, that the section does not save any rights or remedies in respect of the non-registration of any existing company; so that in the case of such companies dissolved by non-compliance with the provisions of the act a very serious question may arise as to those rights.

SIR,—With reference to the strictures in your last number on the recent case of Alicia Race, heard in private, and not yet reported, I may possibly do some service, having been one of the counsel in the cause, by supplying you with the following information:—

1. Your correspondent is mistaken in supposing that the counsel for the mother did not argue the question of the jurisdiction; on the contrary, that was the principal point which they did argue, and the only one on which, in my belief, there was any reasonable doubt.

2. The arguments in the case occupied in all two complete days, or more, and every point was fully gone into. Most of the authorities to which your correspondent refers, and many others, were cited and commented on; and at the end the Vice-Chancellor (Sir R. T. Kindersley) delivered an elaborate, and if I may say so without presumption, a well and carefully reasoned, though not a written, judgment, directing the education of the child in the religion of her father.

3. The Vice-Chancellor did not in his judgment refer to or make any remark on the case of In re North, (11 Jur., part 1, p. 7), referred to in your correspondent's letter; or the still stronger case, to the like effect, of In re Hunt, (2 Con. & L. 371)—Lord St. Leonards' decision, not there referred to—both of which cases were cited and urged in the argument; or the case of Witty v. Marshall, (1 Y. & C. C. C. 68), also relied on by the counsel for the infant. These cases, no doubt, had weight; but his judgment was expressly based on another and unreported case, which had been also cited and commented on by the counsel for the infant, viz. the case of Bligh v. Bligh, (Lord Darnley's case), decided by Lord Cottenham in 1836, and the order in which is to be found in Set. Dec. 353, 2nd ed. The Vice-Chancellor had procured the papers in this cause from the Report Office, and entered into a minute examination of the circumstances of the case, which more than supported the judgment he was pronouncing.

4. The grounds on which the judgment proceeded are, in my apprehension, three:—

(1). That the religion of the father, in the absence of any other circumstances, governs that of his children. (Bligh v. Bligh, In re North, In re Hunt, Talbot v. Shrewsbury, 4 My. & C. 672; the dictum in Witty v. Marshall). In Villareal v. Mellish (2 Swanst. 533) there were other circumstances which excluded the application of the rule, and principally that the Jewish religion was then under penal disabilities.

(2). That the mother in the principal case, there being no testamentary guardian, had expressly admitted that the father's will was, that the children should be brought up Protestants, and had acted thereon consistently up to the time of the application, the application itself not being prompted by any religious objections, but having proceeded from circumstances entirely collateral and irrelevant.

(3). That the child had been brought up from her birth until the present time in the religion of the Church of England; and that the Court will not, unless compelled, change a fixed course of education, and risk the unsettling of the child's principles. (Witty v. Marshall).

I may add, that it was contended, inter alia, by the counsel for the mother, that she was testamentary guardian; but on this point the Vice-Chancellor expressed a very decided opinion that she was not so, and considered that the religious education of the child would not be governed by that point, whichever way it had been. I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

H.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—Will you permit me to call your attention to two recent decisions on voluntary trusts, which I think were not alluded to in your last number, viz. Airey v. Hall (2 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 658) and Parnell v. Hingston and Others, (Id. 854), in both of which Sir J. Stuart, V. C., seems to have held, that if the owner of a chose in action makes a voluntary assignment to a trustee, upon trust for a third party, although the legal interest fails in being vested in the trustee, yet the trusts are thereby validly fastened on the property in the hands of the owner himself. This view seems to be unsupported either by principle or authority, and is directly at variance with the case of Ward v. Audland, (8 Beav. 202), in which Lord Langdale held, that such an assignment, as it did not vest the legal interest in the trustee, failed to establish a valid trust, on the ground (which is intelligible and clear) that his intention was to assign the property to the trustee upon trusts to be executed by him, "and not to create himself a trustee."

While I am upon the subject, I venture to suggest the following simple propositions as the general result of the authorities on the validity of voluntary assignments of choses in action, viz.—

1. The term "equitable assignment" is, strictly speaking, a misnomer, what is really meant by the term being "an assignment of the equitable interest," or the creation of the relation of trustee and cestui que trust.

2. If A. has only an equitable interest, and assigns it to B., the transaction is complete and valid.

3. If A. has both the legal and equitable interest, but attempts to transfer no more than the latter, as by declaring himself a trustee for B., the transaction is complete and valid.

4. If A. attempt to assign both his legal and equitable interest to B., the assignment, failing as to the legal interest, fails also as to the equitable interest, (i. e. if without consideration), the transaction being incomplete.

5. If A. thus attempt to assign his legal interest to B. upon trust for C., the legal interest not being thereby vested in B., the trust in favour of C. fails with it, the transaction being in this instance also incomplete.

I remain, yours respectfully,

CHITTY'S COLLECTION of STATUTES of PRACTICAL UTILITY. With Notes thereon. Intended as a Circuit and Court Companion. The Second Edition. Containing all the Statutes of Practical Utility in the Civil and Criminal Administration of Justice to the Present Time. By W. N. WELSBY and EDWARD BEAVAN, Esqrs., Barristers at Law.

 In the debate on the proposed consolidation of the Statutes, on the 9th February, 1854, Lord Campbell said, "that the Statutes at Large extended to about fifty volumes folio, but all the Statutes which were usually required by lawyers for reference might be found in three octavo volumes compiled by his learned friend Mr. Welsby. When he (Lord Campbell) was upon the bench he always had this work by him, and no Statutes were ever referred to by the Bar which he could not find in it."

This important Work will be continued annually, by an Edition of the Statutes, arranged on a similar plan, with a full Index, being published shortly after the close of each Session. Edited by E. BEAVAN, Esq. Two Supplements, containing the Statutes of 1854 and 1855, are now ready, price 9s. 6d. each, sewed.

ROYAL INSURANCE COMPANY.—Notice is hereby given, that this Company has returned to its Offices, (which have been rebuilt). No. 29, Lombard-street, at the corner of Clement's-lane.

FIRE BRANCH.—The Fire premium in 1856 amounted to about 150,000*l*., placing the Company among the very largest offices in the kingdom; indeed, it is believed that there are only three or four offices which equal it in fire revenue. Insurances are received upon nearly all descriptions of property in the United Kingdom, the Colonies, and most Foreign Countries; the rates of premium are exceedingly moderate, and governed in each case by a careful consideration of the risk proposed.

LIFE BRANCH.—The Life revenue during the past year amounted to about 40,000*l*., the new premiums alone exceeding 10,000*l*. A bonus was declared in 1854 of 2*l*. per cent. per annum on the sum insured, averaging about 80*l*. per cent. of the premiums paid, being one of the largest ever declared. All the insurances effected during the present year will participate in the next bonus in 1859.

The paid-up and invested Capital, including Life Funds, amounts to nearly Half a Million sterling.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTION LAW. By Mr. WARREN, M. P., D.C.L., one of her Majesty's Counsel, and Recorder of Hull.

Messrs. BUTTERWORTH beg to announce that in a few days will be published—with the Statutes and Decisions continued down to the close of the present Parliament, and an Explanatory Chapter—Mr. WARREN'S MANUAL of the PARLIAMENTARY ELECTION LAW of the UNITED KINGDOM, and of the Law and Practice of Election Committees. Either volume may at present be had separately.

"Such a work has long been much wanted, and I have looked sufficiently into it to be satisfied that Mr. Warren has bestowed all requisite labour and attention on the subject; and, as I know the learning and talent by which that labour and attention have been directed, I confidently anticipate that Members of Parliament and the Profession will fully appreciate the service he has rendered. With the skill of an accomplished artist, he has collected what before existed only in fragment and dispersion, and by extracting order out of confusion, and evolving consistency from a mass of contradiction, has digested and constructed a practical system, furnishing a safe and accurate guide in the discharge of most important duties, hitherto incapable of being performed with satisfaction to either the judges or to the litigant parties."—The late Lord Truro.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, MARCH 14, 1857.

THE maxim "In jure non remota causa, sed proxima spectatur," has had its true limits assigned to it by the Court of Queen's Bench in the recent case of Thompson v. Hopper, (3 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 133; 26 L. J., Q. B., 18). Like other maxims, it requires to be taken in a non-literal sense, for it is as necessary in law as in logic (and in this respect they are identical) to trace effects to their primary causes, however remote they may be. To rest on secondary causes merely is a fertile source of error, and in the administration of justice would be the means of doing serious wrong. The efficient cause, or the cause sine quâ non, is the true cause, everything that follows from it being rather a series of effects than causes in themselves. The maxim in question has been thus paraphrased by Lord Bacon:—"It were infinite for the law to consider the causes of causes, and their impulsions one of another; therefore it contenteth itself with the immediate cause, and judgeth of acts by that, without looking to any further degree." Far more difficult and complicated questions, however, than the tracing of a sequence of events to the first cause are daily solved in our courts of justice in a satisfactory manner. And indeed, in the application of this maxim, which is generally in cases of insurance, it will be found to be practically disregarded wherever it conflicts with the principles of insurance law, or the manifest intention of the parties. Thus, where a vessel laden with hides and tobacco had in the course of the voyage shipped large quantities of sea-water, and at the termination of the voyage it was discovered that the sea-water had rendered the hides putrid, and that the putrefaction of the hides had imparted an ill flavour to the tobacco, and had thereby injured it, it was held that the damage thus occasioned to the tobacco was a loss by perils of the sea. (Montoya v. The London Insurance Company, 6 Exch. 451). Here the Court ascended from the proximate cause, the putrefaction of the hides, to that which made them putrid, the shipping of sea-water. So where, upon an insurance against loss by fire, the loss resulted from fire occasioned by the barratrous act of the master and crew, it was held that the loss by fire so caused was not within the policy. (Waters v. The Louisville Insurance Company, 11 Peters' Rep., U. S., 219; Broom's Maxims, 170). And where a neutral American ship was captured, and condemned in a French court as prize, on the ground that she was not provided with the proper documents, it was held that the owners could not recover upon the insurance on the ship as for a loss by capture, as their neglect was the efficient cause of the loss. (Bell v. Carstairs, 14 East, 374). And in Thompson v. Hopper the various links of the chain were traced with a careful hand, until at length the faulty one that really caused the disaster was fixed upon and condemned. The facts were these:—A ship, having been loaded in Sunderland Harbour, was sent out of the harbour, and across the bar, into an open roadstead, for the purpose of taking advantage of a spring tide. At this time her rigging was in some respects incomplete, and in consequence thereof she was obliged to be brought up in the roadstead, and riggers were sent out, who completed her rigging and equipment there. After the defects had been repaired, but before the ship had left the roadstead, a sudden storm came on, which caused her to drag her anchor, and being unable to slip the cable, she went on shore and was wrecked. An action was now brought on the policy of insurance which had been effected upon her, it being alleged by the insurer that the loss had been caused by the perils of the sea. It was proved at the trial, in addition to the above-mentioned facts, that it was by the authority of the insurer that the ship was sent out of the harbour, and that he was aware of the state in which she was when she left. The learned judge who presided at the trial asked the jury to find whether any of these wrongful acts on the part of the insurer were the direct and proximate cause of the loss; but the full Court held that this was a misdirection, and that they should have been asked to find whether any of such acts were the efficient cause, without which the loss would not have happened. Lord Campbell, C. J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, said—"The maxim 'In jure non remota causa, sed proxima spectatur,' is qualified by another general maxim, 'Dolus circuitu non purgatur;' and 'dolus' means any wrongful act tending to the damage of another. This is well illustrated by the case of Davies v. Garbett, (6 Bing. N. C. 717), which was an action for not safely carrying lime for the plaintiff in the defendant's barge on a certain voyage, the declaration alleging that the barge deviated from the usual and proper course of the voyage, and by means thereof was assailed by a storm and wrecked, whereby the lime was lost. In fact, the master of the barge did unnecessarily and wrongfully deviate from the usual and proper course of the voyage. During the deviation a tempest wetted the lime, and, the barge taking fire, the whole was lost. The defence was, that the loss did not arise directly and proximately from the deviation. 'But,' said Tindal, C. J., 'it is obvious that the legal consequences must be the same whether the loss was immediately by the sinking of the barge at once by a heavy sea when she was out of her direct and usual course, or whether it happened at the same place, not in consequence of an immediate death-wound, but by a connected chain of causes producing the same ultimate event. We think that no wrongdoer can be allowed to apportion or qualify his own wrong, and that as a loss has actually happened while his wrongful act was in operation and force, and which is attributable to his wrongful act, he cannot set up as an answer to the action the bare possibility of a loss if his wrongful act had never been done.' . . . We are of opinion that the maxim relied upon can never be applied where it contravenes the fundamental rule of insurance law, that the insurers are not liable for a loss occasioned by the wrongful act of the insured." And Lord Campbell delivered it as the opinion of the Court, that the question in such cases was, not whether the "wrongful act or neglect of the insured was the proximate cause or causa causans of the loss, but whether it was a cause without which the loss would not have happened." This decision, it will be seen, affirms that the Courts will look beyond the proximate to the remote cause; at all events, in two cases—first, where a contrary course would contravene the principles of insurance law, e. g. where the loss has been occasioned by the wrongful act or neglect of the insurer, in which case he ought not to be indemnified; and, secondly, where it would contravene the manifest intention of the parties.

The judgment in Thompson v. Hopper may also be usefully applied to the doctrine of remoteness of damage; and we cannot help thinking that it will tend to place it upon a more satisfactory footing than it has hitherto occupied. In those instances in which it clearly appears that the defendant's wrongful act was the efficient cause of the damage, what difference does it make in the legal any more than in the logical result, that such damage was not proximate, but removed from the wrongful act by several intermediate effects? The question is one, no doubt, of considerable difficulty, but it may be well, in reference to it, to bear in mind the language of Tindal, C. J.—"No wrongdoer can be allowed to apportion or qualify his own wrong."

Correspondence.

GUARDIANSHIP IN CHANCERY.—IN RE RACE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—Your correspondent "H." has really confirmed my argument, which was, that the mere fact that the mother is of a different form of religion from the father (apart either from testament or trust) does not give the Chancellor jurisdiction to withdraw the child from her, assuming that legally and socially both religions are on a par. He cites Lady Darnley's case, (Bligh v. Bligh, Set. Dec. 534); but there the mother was an Irvingite, and certainly there was, socially speaking, a danger of "disparagement" to the heir of the peer of the realm; and the case came within the principle on which In re Hunt (2 Con. & Lef. Ir. Rep. 371) was decided by Lord St. Leonards.

Your correspondent says that the decision in Re Race was mainly based on Bligh v. Bligh. It could hardly, I think, have been so, since the ratio decidendi in the two cases could not possibly have been the same, as your correspondent clearly shews that there were special grounds in Re Race, probably as he states them, sufficient to sustain the decision; but even if so, perfectly consistent with my argument, which is, that the child cannot be withdrawn from the mother solely on the ground of difference of religion; and in both my articles I expressly intimated that possibly the decision in Re Race, as in Re North, might be upheld on special grounds. Your correspondent, therefore, rather supports my general argument, by shewing the strong special grounds which existed in that case against the mother's claim. He says, indeed, I am mistaken in stating that "the question of jurisdiction" was not argued in Re Race. But what I meant was, that it was not argued on the several grounds I take; and most unquestionably it was not; as I, who was counsel in the case, (though not in equity), can state, on the same authority as that on which he makes his statement—a statement, indeed, which, coupled with this explanation, is quite consistent with mine. The "question of jurisdiction," as far as it was argued, was founded on collateral grounds, as colourable locus standi, legitimacy, &c. But the counsel for the mother did not, and could not under the circumstances, argue the simple question I have argued, upon general principles; for there were special circumstances which displaced the general principle in that case; and I am glad your correspondent "H." has made this clear.

I am, Sir, your faithful servant,

The Writer of the Articles on the Subject.

Reviews.

The Practice of the County Courts; with the Decisions of the Superior Courts, and Tables of Fees. Also Appendices, containing all the Statutes, Rules of Practice, and Forms. The Third Edition, in Two Parts. By Charles Edward Pollock and Henry Nicol, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law. [Sweet, 1857.]

The second edition of this work was published in 1853, and since that period the act of last session has worked most important alterations in the law administered by county courts, while the New Rules framed under it constitute a consolidated practice in those popular tribunals. The Friendly Societies Acts have affected the jurisdiction of county courts, and summary procedure with regard to bills of exchange has been extended to them. The decisions in our superior courts upon this branch of law have also been numerous and important. Mr. Pollock and Mr. Nicol have skilfully dealt with these accumulated materials, and have produced a valuable book, containing all that can be desired upon the subject. It is divided into two parts. The first treats of the jurisdiction of the courts in all matters except those which arise under the insolvent and protection statutes. These are contained in the second part. An appendix of statutes and forms, together with a full index, follows each part, and may be easily distinguished by the edges of the leaves being differently coloured.

The Magisterial Synopsis: a Practical Guide for Magistrates, their Clerks and Attornies, in all Matters out of Quarter Sessions; containing Summary Convictions and Indictable Offences, with their Penalties, Punishments, Procedure, &c., tabularly arranged. By George C. Oke, Assistant Clerk to the Lord Mayor of London. Fifth Edition. [Butterworth, 1857.]

The wide scope of jurisdiction conferred upon magistrates, and the varied and complicated character of their duties, have rendered practical works of reference upon the subject essential to the magistrate and to the practitioner in his courts. Mr. Oke's "Synopsis" of the law, as administered by justices out of quarter sessions, is too well known and too highly appreciated to require comment from us. It is sufficient to mention the appearance of the fifth edition, simply adding that it contains several new titles, namely, "Betting Houses," "Customs," "Merchant Shipping," "Nuisances," "Reformatory Schools," "Seamen," and "Ships' Passengers;" and a new chapter upon summary jurisdiction in larceny.

Members returned to serve in Parliament.—Walter Buchanan, Esq., for the city of Glasgow, in the room of John M'Gregor, Esq., who has accepted the office of Steward of her Majesty's Manor of Northstead, Yorkshire.—Henry North Holroyd, commonly called Viscount Pevensey, for the Eastern Division of the county of Sussex, in the room of Charles Hay Frewen, Esq., who has accepted the office of Steward of her Majesty's Chiltern Hundreds.

PUBLIC EXAMINATION OF STUDENTS.

Trinity Term, 1857.

The Council of Legal Education have approved of the following rules for the public examination of the students.

The attention of the students is requested to the following rules of the Inns of Court:—

"As an inducement to students to propose themselves for examination, studentships shall be founded of fifty guineas per annum each, to continue for a period of three years, and one such studentship shall be conferred on the most distinguished student at each public examination; and further, the examiners shall select and certify the names of three other students who shall have passed the next best examinations, and the Inns of Court to which such students belong may, if desired, dispense with any terms, not exceeding two, that may remain to be kept by such students previously to their being called to the Bar. Provided that the examiners shall not be obliged to confer or grant any studentship or certificate unless they shall be of opinion that the examination of the students they select has been such as entitles them thereto."

"At every call to the Bar those students who have passed a public examination, and either obtained a studentship or a certificate of honour, shall take rank in seniority over all other students who shall be called on the same day."

"No student shall be eligible to be called to the Bar who shall not either have attended during one whole year the lectures of two of the Readers, or have satisfactorily passed a public examination."

Rules for the Public Examination of Candidates for Honours, or Certificates entitling Students to be called to the Bar.

An examination will be held in next Trinity Term, to which a student of any of the Inns of Court, who is desirous of becoming a candidate for a studentship or honours, or of obtaining a certificate of fitness for being called to the Bar, will be admissible.

Each student proposing to submit himself for examination will be required to enter his name at the treasurer's office of the Inn of Court to which he belongs on or before Tuesday, the 12th day of May next; and he will further be required to state in writing whether his object in offering himself for examination is to compete for a studentship or other honourable distinction, or whether he is merely desirous of obtaining a certificate preliminary to a call to the Bar.

The examination will commence on Tuesday, the 19th day of May next, and will be continued on the Wednesday and Thursday following.

It will take place in the Benchers' Reading-room of Lincoln's-inn; and the doors will be closed ten minutes after the time appointed for the commencement of the examination.

The examination by printed questions will be conducted in the following order:—

Tuesday morning, the 19th May, at half-past nine, on Constitutional Law and Legal History; in the afternoon, at half-past one, on Equity.

Wednesday morning, the 20th May, at half-past nine, on Common Law; in the afternoon, at half-past one, on the Law of Real Property, &c.

Thursday morning, the 21st May, at half-past nine, on Jurisprudence and the Civil Law; in the afternoon, at half-past one, a paper will be given to the students including questions bearing upon all the foregoing subjects of examination.

The oral examination will be conducted in the same order, during the same hours, and on the same subjects, as those already marked out for the examination by printed questions, except that on Thursday afternoon there will be no oral examination.

The oral examination of each student will be conducted apart from the other students; and the character of that examination will vary, according as the student is a candidate for honours or a studentship, or desires simply to obtain a certificate.

The oral examination and printed questions will be founded on the books below mentioned, regard being had, however, to the particular object with a view to which the student presents himself for examination.

In determining the question, whether a student has passed the examination in such a manner as to entitle him to be called to the Bar, the examiners will principally have regard to the general knowledge of law and jurisprudence which he has displayed.

A student may present himself at any number of examinations, until he shall have obtained a certificate.

Any student who shall obtain a certificate may present himself a second time for examination as a candidate for the studentship, but only at one of the three examinations immediately succeeding that at which he shall have obtained such certificate; provided, that if any student so presenting himself shall not succeed in obtaining the studentship, his name shall not appear in the list.

Students who have kept more than eleven terms shall not be admitted to an examination for the studentship.

The Reader on Constitutional Law and Legal History proposes to examine on the following subjects:—

He will expect the candidates for honours in the ensuing examination to possess a general knowledge of the leading events of English History, from the Conquest to the close of the last century.

He will expect them to be accurately acquainted with the Chapters in Hallam's Constitutional History which treat of the Reigns of Elizabeth, of James I, Charles I, Charles II, and William; with the first volume of Lord Clarendon; with May's History; with the Chapters in Rapin and Tindal or Belsham, giving an account of those Reigns; and with Bishop Burnet's Memoirs of his own Times during the Reigns of Charles II and William III.

He will expect them to be acquainted with the Law of Treason and the Law relating to the Press down to the present time; and with the most important State Trials and Impeachments during the reigns he has mentioned.

The candidates for a pass will be required to answer general questions in English History, and to be well acquainted with the History of the Reigns of Elizabeth, of Charles I, and Charles II.

They will be expected also to shew a competent knowledge of the State Trials during the reigns of Charles II and James II.

CAUTION.—TO TRADESMEN, MERCHANTS, SHIPPERS, OUTFITTERS, &c.

WHEREAS it has lately come to my knowledge that some unprincipled person or persons have for some time past been imposing upon the public, by selling to the Trade and others a spurious article under the name of BOND'S PERMANENT MARKING INK; this is to give Notice, that I am the original and sole Proprietor and Manufacturer of the said Article, and do not employ any traveller, or autherise any persons to represent themselves as coming from my establishment, for the purpose of selling the said Ink. This Caution is published by me to prevent further imposition upon the public, and serious injury to myself.

E. R. BOND, Sole Executrix and Widow of the late John Bond, 28, Long-lane, West Smithfield, London.

 To avoid disappointment from the substitution of counterfeits, be careful to ask for the genuine Bond's Permanent Marking Ink; and further to distinguish it, observe that NO SIXPENNY SIZE is or has at any time been prepared by him, the Inventor and Proprietor.

 Orders for THE JURIST given to any Newsman, or letter (post-paid) sent to the Office, No. 3, CHANCERY LANE, or to STEVENS & NORTON, 26, BELL YARD, LINCOLN'S INN, will insure its punctual delivery in London, or its being forwarded on the evening of publication, through the medium of the Post Office, to the Country.

ROYAL INSURANCE COMPANY.—Notice is hereby given, that this Company has returned to its Offices, (which have been rebuilt), No. 29, Lombard-street, at the corner of Clement's-lane. Offices in Liverpool—Royal Insurance-buildings, North John-street, and Dale-street.

Fire Branch.—The Fire premium in 1856 amounted to about 150,000*l.*, placing the Company among the very largest offices in the kingdom; indeed, it is believed that there are only three or four offices which equal it in fire revenue. Insurances are received upon nearly all descriptions of property in the United Kingdom, the Colonies, and most Foreign Countries; the rates of premium are exceedingly moderate, and governed in each case by a careful consideration of the risk proposed.

Life Branch.—The Life revenue during the past year amounted to about 40,000*l.*, the new premiums alone exceeding 10,000*l.* A bonus was declared in 1854 of 2*l.* per cent. per annum on the sum insured, averaging about 80*l.* per cent. of the premiums paid, being one of the largest ever declared. All the insurances effected during the present year will participate in the next bonus in 1859.

The paid-up and invested Capital, including Life Funds, amounts to nearly Half a Million sterling.

PERCY M. DOVE, Manager.
JOHN B. JOHNSTON, Secretary to the London Board.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, MARCH 21, 1857.

A POINT has lately been mooted to which we think it worth while to call attention, as it is one of importance to those concerned with the affairs of burial boards, and has not been the subject of judicial decision, viz. whether conveyances to burial boards of land purchased by them for the formation of burial grounds require to be inrolled in the manner prescribed by the act 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, commonly but inaccurately spoken of as the Mortmain Act.

We believe that it has not been the practice to inrol such conveyances, but there has lately been some difference of opinion on the question whether it is not necessary to do so; and it may not be useless to consider whether there is such reasonable ground for holding it necessary as to make it at all events desirable, as a measure of precaution, to inrol them in future.

The first question which arises is, whether such conveyances are conveyances "in trust or for the benefit of any charitable uses whatsoever," within the meaning of the statute in question. The extended meaning which has been given by the Courts to the word "charity" is well known, and it would be useless to enter into a citation of authorities on the point. Lord Camden in Jones v. Williams (Amb. 651) says, "Definition of charity—a gift to a general public use, which extends to the poor as well as to the rich." We think there is little doubt that if a person were to devise a piece of land to be used as a burial ground by all the inhabitants of a parish, this would be a devise to a charitable use, being a gift for the public benefit, and extending both to rich and poor. The purpose to which the land is dedicated is such as we think, upon the authorities, would make the gift charitable. There is, however, another point to be looked to—one to which it is not so often necessary to advert, and on which, therefore, there is great scarcity of authority. "I am of opinion," says Sir J. Leach in The Attorney-General v. Heelis, (2 Sim. & S. 77), "that it is the source whence the funds are derived, and not the mere purpose to which they are dedicated, that constitutes the use charitable; and that funds derived from the gift of the Crown or the gift of the Legislature, or from private gift, for paving, lighting, cleansing, and improving a town, are, within the equity of the statute of Elizabeth, charitable funds to be administered by this Court; but where an act of Parliament passes for paving, lighting, cleansing, and improving a town, to be paid for wholly by rates or assessments to be levied upon the inhabitants of that town, the funds so raised, being in no sense derived from bounty or charity, in the most extensive use of that word, are not charitable funds to be administered by this Court." Now, in the case before us, the purpose is one which might point at the conveyance being one to a charity, but the funds are derived from the poor rates. The land purchased is "paid for wholly by rates levied upon the inhabitants of the parish:" the parish, in substance, buys the ground for its own use. If the ground were given, that might be a charity; but when it is purchased it may be considered as paid for by the persons who are to have the use of it; and this seems to exclude the idea of charity. Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, L. J., when Vice-Chancellor, is reported, in The Attorney-

General v. Compton, (1 Y. & C. C. C. 417, 424), to have said that The Attorney-General v. Heelis was on this point opposed to The Attorney-General v. Brown, (1 Swanst. 265). This, however, was a mere observation made during the argument: the judgment does not proceed upon it, or advert to it; and it was probably not intended as a deliberate expression of opinion. His Lordship has elsewhere said, (5 De G., Mac., & G. 501), that it is seldom useful to report such remarks, as they are generally made only for the purpose of directing the attention of counsel to particular views of the controversy; and we have no doubt that the remark in question was made solely with that view. We do not think that The Attorney-General v. Heelis was intended to be or is inconsistent, on this point, with The Attorney-General v. Brown, nor that the law as laid down by Sir J. Leach can be treated as having been impeached. (See The Attorney-General v. The Mayor of Dublin, 1 Bligh, N. S., 312, and Nightingale v. Goulburn, 5 Hare, 484, 488, for remarks on that case; and see for the general law on the subject, The Attorney-General v. Gort, 6 Dowl. 136; The Attorney-General v. The Mayor of Carlisle, 2 Sim. 437; The Attorney-General v. The Corporation of Galway, Beat. 304; and The Attorney-General v. The Corporation of Shrewsbury, 6 Beav. 220). The distinction in The Attorney-General v. Heelis seems founded on reason, and if it be law, we think that it cannot well be contended that a conveyance to a burial board of land which it purchases can be called a conveyance to a charitable use.

Supposing, however, that this view be incorrect, the question remains, whether the statutes from which burial boards derive their powers do not dispense with the inrolment. The only act which appears to have any material bearing on the question is the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, for regulating burials in the metropolis; as the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 134, which applies to burials in the country, does little more than extend the provisions of the former act to the country by reference.

The object of the 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, is to restrain conveyances and gifts to charitable purposes. It would seem to be an application of this act to cases not within its spirit to make it apply to purchases which the Legislature has by the burial acts directed to be made, and taken means to encourage and bring about. This might not of itself be conclusive, but, in construing the letter of a statute, it is by no means unimportant in any case to see what its spirit is; and in considering whether the provisions of a later statute are to be held, in matters directly within their scope, to supersede those of a former, it is equally material to take into account whether what the latter directs to be done is not thereby taken out of the spirit of the restrictive provisions of the former. The letter may be so expressed that the spirit cannot prevail against it; but if the letter be doubtful, the general object of the Legislature has a most important bearing in interpreting its language; and in the present case the à priori reasonableness and probability of the Legislature intending to exempt what in a particular case it requires to be done, from provisions designed to check the doing of it in general, must give greater weight to anything from which the expression of such intention may be gathered.

Now, the 25th section of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, enacts, that "every burial board shall, with all convenient speed, proceed to provide a burial ground for the parish or parishes for which they are appointed to act, and to make arrangements for facilitating interments therein;" thus making it imperative on the board to provide a burial ground. To facilitate the doing this, the 27th section incorporates the greater part of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. Among the sections so incorporated is the 7th, which enlarges, in the most extensive manner, the powers of parties disposed to sell to "the promoters of the undertaking," i. e. to the board. It enables trustees, tenants for life, and others to sell and convey to the board, thus giving them a statutory power to sell what is not their own; and this section has received a liberal construction, for an instance of which see In re The Cuckfield Burial Board, (18 Beav. 153). It would be a singular state of things if these extraordinary statutory powers to convey to a particular class of charitable bodies should be held subject to a restriction on the right to convey to charity generally. But the matter does not rest here. The 81st section, which is also incorporated in the Burial Act, enacts, that "conveyances of lands to be purchased under the provisions of this or the special act, or any act incorporated therewith, may be according to the forms in the Schedules (A.) and (B.) respectively to this act annexed, or as near thereto as the circumstances of the case will admit, or by deed in any other form which the promoters of the undertaking may think fit; and all conveyances made according to the forms in the said schedules, or as near thereto as the circumstances of the case will admit, shall be effectual to vest the lands thereby conveyed in the promoters of the undertaking;" and it then goes on to provide, that such conveyances shall have certain further effects beyond those attending an ordinary conveyance. Now, the form of conveyance which the Legislature declares shall effectually vest the land in the board will be found, on referring to the Schedules (A.) and (B.), to be a deed-poll; but stat. 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, requires that conveyances to charities shall be "by deed indented." It is therefore impossible to make the two acts completely work together. The Legislature has provided, in express terms, that a burial board may take land by a deed of a certain description, which does not comply with the requisitions of the 9 Geo. 2, c. 36. It would be absurd to say that it is requisite to inrol these deeds-poll under that statute; for, as they are not indentures, they would not satisfy its provisions if they were inrolled; and there is no trace of intention that they should be. Had the act intended them to be in any way inrolled, it would no doubt have said so; and in the case of copyhold lands it has so done. Now, the Legislature does not require any particular formalities to be observed as to these deeds-poll; nothing is prescribed as to them which can be supposed to be intended as a substitute for inrolment; and it would be difficult to hold, that if the board take a conveyance by deed-poll, they need not inrol it, but that if they take one by indenture, it must be inrolled. We think, therefore, that the intention of the Legislature, that conveyances to burial boards on sales to them should not require inrolment, is sufficiently expressed.

The cases of Mogg v. Hodges (2 Ves. sen. 52) and The British Museum v. White (2 Sim. & S. 595) have been referred to as decisive in support of the contrary view, but we do not think that they are so. The special acts in those cases appear to have been merely intended to take away the disability of a corporation to hold land without a license in mortmain, and not to have been directed at exempting other parties from their inability to give land to it, except in a particular way. Those cases turned on gifts by will, and we do not mean to lay down that a gift by will to a burial board would be good. It might, perhaps, be held that it is so, on the principle of The Attorney-General v. The Haberdashers' Company, (1 My. & K. 420); but whether that be so or not, a gift by will, or a voluntary gift by deed, stands on a materially different footing from a sale. The fund out of which the burial ground is to be purchased not being a charitable fund, (The Attorney-General v. Heelis), if the board buys for value there is no charity in the case; but if a free gift is made, bounty is for the first time introduced, and it is by no means clear that the gift is not charitable.

We may add, that the question has lately been before a conveyancer of the very highest eminence, and that he gave an opinion, founded on reasons substantially identical with the above, to the effect that inrolment was not necessary.

EVERYTHING connected with the subject of patents seems to wear an aspect of perplexity and confusion. Even the statutes relating to it appear to have been drawn with, if possible, less than usual attention to the proper use of words, and the grammatical construction of sentences. Of this the case of In re Macintosh's Patent, (2 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1242), which lately came before the Lord Chancellor, furnishes an interesting example. That case, as reported in our columns, is briefly as follows:—On the 6th August, 1855, one John Macintosh, an applicant for letters-patent for an invention "of certain improvements in the application of incendiary materials to be used in warfare," delivered his petition, declaration, and provisional specification at the office of the Commissioners of Patents, and on the same day procured a certificate that provisional protection had been allowed. The Solicitor-General's warrant for sealing the letters-patent was signed on the 18th December, 1855, and on the same day objections to the sealing were lodged by the solicitor to the Ordnance, the purport of which objections was, that such an invention as the applicant's could only be used in time of war, and that the publication of it might be prejudicial to her Majesty's service. On the 5th May, 1856, peace having intervened, the objections were withdrawn. On the 22nd November, 1856, the applicant presented a petition for the sealing of the letters-patent; but the Lord Chancellor, on the ground that no reason was stated why the application was not made on or immediately after the 5th May, 1856, refused the order prayed. The petition, which was the subject of the present case, was then presented, stating that the petitioner was desired by the Secretary of State for War, during the period between the 5th May and the 17th November, 1856, to delay taking the necessary steps to procure the sealing of the said letters-patent, but that on the 17th November the direction of the Secretary of State for War was withdrawn, and praying that the letters-patent might be forthwith sealed, and for time to deposit the specification.

The 19th section of the Patent-law Amendment Act, 1852, (15 & 16 Vict. c. 83), provides, "that no letters-patent, save &c. in the case of letters-patent destroyed or lost, shall issue on any warrant, &c., unless application be made to seal such letters-patent within three months after the date of the said warrant." In this case the first application to seal was not made until eleven months had elapsed since the date of the warrant. The 20th section of the Patent-law Amendment Act provides, "that no letters-patent (save letters-patent issued in lieu of others destroyed or lost) shall be issued, or be of any force or effect, unless the same be granted during the continuance of the provisional protection under this act, or where a complete specification has been deposited &c.; save that where the application to seal such letters-patent has been made during the continuance of such provisional or other protection, &c., and the sealing of such letters-patent has been delayed by reason of a caveat, or an application to the Lord Chancellor against or in relation to the sealing of such letters-patent, then such letters-patent may be sealed at such time as the Lord Chancellor shall direct." In this case the letters-patent were not granted during the continuance of the protection. Neither did this case fall strictly within the exception in the 20th section; for no application was made to seal the letters-patent during the continuance of the provisional protection, which lasts only for six months from the date of the application for letters-patent. So far, however, as it was necessary, in order to bring this case within that exception, that the delay in sealing should have been caused by the caveat, the provision to that effect in the 20th section may, perhaps, be considered to have been complied with; for from the 18th December, 1855, to the 5th May, 1856, the sealing may fairly be said to have been delayed by the caveat, inasmuch as it was in consequence of the caveat that the application to seal was postponed; although after the 5th May the delay arose from a different cause. Probably the Legislature did not intend, that when the delay in sealing has been caused for a time by the entry of a caveat, but prolonged for a different reason, the Lord Chancellor should have authority to direct the sealing at any time; but meant, that, if the provisional protection had expired, the sealing should take place as soon as it reasonably might after the withdrawal of the caveat, without regard to any other cause of delay. Still a literal interpretation of the words of this clause only would enable the Lord Chancellor, where the delay in sealing letters-patent has been originally caused by a caveat, to direct them to be sealed at any time, provided the other requisites have been complied with; and under the peculiar circumstances of this case, it was natural, though perhaps not quite prudent, for the judge to prefer the literal interpretation, which would help the petitioner, to the probable intention of the act, which might have inflicted a great hardship upon him. Accordingly we find that his Lordship made an order directing the letters-patent to be sealed at once, and the specification to be lodged within a month; notwithstanding that the delay, of which the caveat was the origin, had been extended by another circumstance, not apparently within the contemplation of the Legislature when the act was passed. But the obstacle which, by thus adhering to the strict letter of the statute, the Lord Chancellor was enabled to avoid, was not the only one which opposed itself to the making of the above order; and his Lordship, when he granted this relief, involved himself in other difficulties, which it required other means to encounter and overcome; for by no literal interpretation could he escape the provision of sect. 20, which requires, that in the exceptional case the application to seal the letters-patent should have been made during the continuance of the protection; nor that in sect. 19, which requires that the application to seal must be made within three months after the date of the warrant. With respect to these provisions, however, his Lordship appears to have considered, (so far, at least, as can be collected from the whole report, for the Lord Chancellor himself gave no account of his reasons)—first, that the 19th and 20th sections must be construed together, and that in cases which, but for the 19th section, would be exceptional under the 20th, the 20th section must be taken to override and virtually to repeal the 19th; secondly, that where the application to seal has itself been delayed by the entry of a caveat, that part of the clause in the 20th section, which requires that in the exceptional case the application to seal the letters-patent must have been made during the continuance of the protection, could not have been intended to apply. This seems a liberal construction of the act, following not the words, but the object and intention of the Legislature; because the application to seal may just as easily be delayed by the entry of a caveat as the sealing itself, since it would be useless to apply to seal where the sealing would evidently not be ordered; and it is, therefore, just as right that relief should be given in the one case as the other. At the same time his Lordship's decision is open to this objection, that in construing the act he partly regarded the words at the expense of the intention, and partly the intention at the expense of the words; and if acts of Parliament are to be so construed by the Court, it will be exceedingly difficult for counsel to know by what rule of interpretation they are to be guided, when they have to advise their clients.

But there is a clause in another act of Parliament which does not appear to have been noticed by the Lord Chancellor, and with respect to which his Lordship's silence becomes in some sort an interpretation. We allude to the 6th section of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 115, an act which was passed before this case arose. That section says—"Where letters-patent have not been sealed during the continuance of the provisional protection on which the same is granted, provided the delay in such sealing has arisen from accident, and not from the neglect or wilful default of the applicant, it shall be lawful for the Lord Chancellor, if he shall think fit, to seal such letters-patent at any time after the expiration of such provisional protection, whether such expiration has happened before or shall happen after the passing of this act, and to date the sealing thereof as of any day before the expiration of such provisional protection, and also to extend the time for the filing of the specification thereon; and where the specification, in pursuance of the condition of any letters-patent, has not been filed within the time limited by such letters-patent, provided the delay in such filing has arisen from accident, and not from the neglect or wilful default of the patentee, it shall be lawful for the Lord Chancellor, if he shall think fit, to extend the time for the filing of such specification, whether the default in such filing has happened before or shall happen after the passing of this act: provided always, that, except in any case that may have arisen before the passing of this act, it shall not be lawful for the Lord Chancellor to extend the time for the sealing of any letters-patent, or for the filing of any specification, beyond the period of one month." The first part of this clause makes it lawful for the Lord Chancellor to seal letters-patent after the expiration of the provisional protection, where the delay in sealing has arisen from accident, and is confined to those cases. But the proviso in the latter part of the clause is more general in its terms, and, as it appears to us, might be fairly argued to prohibit his Lordship from extending the time for the sealing of any letters-patent in any case whatever, or for the filing of any specification, beyond the period of one month; that is, clearly, one month from the expiration of the protection where the time for sealing is extended, and one month from the time limited by the letters-patent where the time for filing the specification is extended. In support of this construction it must be remembered that this statute (16 & 17 Vict. c. 115) was designed to amend the Patent-law Amendment Act, 1852; and that the two statutes are to be construed together as one act. If, then, we read the 6th section of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 115, in conjunction with the analogous sections of the Patent-law Amendment Act which we have already quoted, we find that by that 6th section an extension of the time for sealing letters-patent is permitted in another instance not contemplated by the Patent-law Amendment Act, viz. where the delay has arisen from accident, as well as where it has been occasioned by the entry of a caveat; but that in all cases a limit is set, beyond which the time for sealing may not be extended. This view is further confirmed by the absence of any limit to the extension of the time for sealing in the exceptional case provided for by the 20th section—a defect which the amending act seems intended to supply; and we are the more strongly led to this conclusion when we see that the limit prescribed by the 19th section of the Patent-law Amendment Act may reasonably be held, and was in fact in the matter of this very petition held, not to apply to cases falling within the exception in the 20th section of that act. But further, what is the precise meaning of the word "accident" in this place? It seems to be contrasted with and explained by the words "neglect or wilful default of the patentee;" and upon this supposition (which is quite in accordance with a method of construction very commonly adopted—that, namely, of defining a doubtful word by its opposite, when both occur in the same sentence) the word "accident" would signify any circumstance, besides the entry of a caveat or an application to the Lord Chancellor against or in respect of the letters-patent, which could not be considered neglect or wilful default on the part of the patentee. But if so, was the sealing in this case in any way delayed by neglect or wilful default on his part? If it was, that surely would have been a just ground for refusing him any indulgence, or at least for declining to strain the sense of the statute in his favour. If it was not so delayed, then the Lord Chancellor, according to the suggested interpretation of the act, would have been expressly prohibited from sealing the letters-patent at any time beyond the period of one month after the expiration of the provisional protection. His Lordship's order, then, if correct, seems to establish this proposition, with reference to the interpretation of the 6th section of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 115. The prohibition in that section, from extending the time for the sealing of any letters-patent beyond the period of one month, only applies to cases where the delay has arisen from accident; and the word "accident" is not so extensive in its signification as to include every circumstance which cannot be imputed as neglect or wilful default to the patentee.

But whatever may be the true construction of these several sections, that construction is, we think, sufficiently doubtful to justify us in advising the applicant for letters-patent, who desires to get them sealed after the expiration of his protection, not to rely too much upon the recent favourable decision of the Lord Chancellor, but to comply with the requisitions of the statutes as far as he possibly can, according to the most stringent interpretation which the words will bear.

LIFE DEPARTMENT.—Under the provisions of an act of Parliament, this Company now offers to future Insurers FOUR-FIFTHS of the PROFITS, with QUINQUENNIAL DIVISION, or a LOW RATE OF PREMIUM without participation of Profits.

The next Division of Profits will be declared in June, 1860, when all Participating Policies which shall have subsisted at least one year at Christmas, 1859, will be allowed to share in the Profits.

At the five Divisions of Profits made by this Company, the total Reversionary Bonuses added to the Policies have exceeded 913,000*l.*

At the last valuation at Christmas, 1854, the Assurances in force amounted to upwards of 4,240,000*l.*, the Income from the Life Branch in 1854 was more than 200,000*l.*, and the Life Assurance Fund (independent of the Guarantee Capital) exceeded 1,700,000*l.*

FOREIGN RISKS.—The Extra Premiums required for the East and West Indies, the British Colonies, and the northern parts of the United States of America, have been materially reduced.

INVALID LIVES.—Persons who are not in such sound health as would enable them to Insure their Lives at the Tabular Premiums may have their Lives Insured at extra Premiums.

LOANS granted on Life Policies to the extent of their values, provided such Policies shall have been effected a sufficient time to have attained in each case a value not under 50*l.*

ASSIGNMENTS OF POLICIES—Written Notices of, received and registered.

Medical fees paid by the Company, and no charge will be made for Policy Stamps.

Notice is hereby given,—That Fire Policies which expire at Lady-day must be renewed within fifteen days at this Office, or with Mr. SAMS, No. 1, St. James's-street, (corner of Pall-mall); or with the Company's Agents throughout the Kingdom; otherwise they become void.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, MARCH 28, 1857.

The tendency of our judges at the present day is to allow contracting parties to make contracts for themselves, instead of making contracts for them; or, in other words, putting a construction upon them which the parties neither intended nor expressed. Hence "judge-made" contracts have now become as rare as judge-made law. There have been times when plain Mr. A. and plain Mr. B. could not enter into a short agreement at the Exchange or in the market without its being subject to astute perversion in the courts. To their surprise they would find that they had said all sorts of things which had never entered into their innocent heads, and that they had made a most subtle contract, with conditions precedent, concurrent, and subsequent; with dependent, independent, and collateral stipulations; that numerous Latin maxims could be brought to bear upon it; that there was not only patent, but latent ambiguity; that a crowd of words very different in sound and ordinary meaning were yet ejusdem generis; and that the sum of money which they mutually imposed for a breach of the contract, and expressly declared should be "liquidated damages," was only a penalty. Many of these legal incidents, no doubt, often produced a just and reasonable result, and are applied to contracts made at the present time; but more liberal principles of construction are adopted, and greater effect is given to the real intention of the parties. An illustration is afforded by the late case of Reynolds v. Bridge, (2 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1164; 26 L. J., Q. B., 12), in which the oft-mooted distinction between a penalty and liquidated damages was again discussed. The plaintiff, who was a surgeon at Wellington, in the county of Somerset, had taken the defendant into partnership for three years, and the deed of partnership contained a covenant that after the determination of the three years the defendant should not practise as a surgeon or apothecary, or see any patients, (except as therein mentioned), or assist or introduce any other medical man in Wellington, but should before the expiration of the three years introduce the plaintiff to the exclusive patients of the defendant, and should also use his best endeavours to secure the same for the plaintiff after the three years; and it was expressly declared and agreed that if the defendant made default in the performance of such covenant, he should forthwith pay to the plaintiff the sum of 2000*l.*, "not in the nature of a penalty, but as ascertained liquidated damages." An action was brought for a breach of the covenant in its terms, and the Court held that the sum of 2000*l.* was to be taken as liquidated damages. Erle, J., in delivering his judgment, said, "The nature of the contract is such that the damage resulting from the breach of the stipulations is uncertain. If the defendant, being in a well-favoured practice, covenants that he will not practise within certain limits, and he breaks that covenant in one or two instances only, it is impossible to calculate exactly the amount of the damages arising from such breaches: the plaintiff might be thereby prevented from attending a particular case, or from getting into a valuable line of practice; and so it might be the loss of a fortune, or it might be only the loss of the amount of the particular bill. It has been laid down as a rule of law, that in some cases a stipulation for payment of a fixed sum as liquidated damages counts for nothing, and in effect the parties have put into their deeds words without any meaning. In the case of a common bond given on a loan of money, in very early times, relief was given to the obligor, who could indemnify the obligee by payment of the principal; and the Courts have extended the same rule to covenants, where the damages stipulated for breaches of the covenant were very large in amount, and have held that the parties only intended that the sum really due should be recovered. But the tenor of the latter decisions is to restrict the operation of that principle, because it militates against another great and governing principle of law, that parties may make what contracts they please within the limits of the law, and that such contracts shall be carried into effect by the Courts according to the intention of the parties, which is to be learnt from the words in the contract itself. In some cases a large exercise of discretion has been assumed by the Courts, and without taking the words used by the parties, the whole instrument has been looked to, and effect given to it according to what was considered to have been a reasonable contract for the parties to enter into. But if we take away the right of the complaining party to receive the damages which have been agreed upon, the party complained of may be liable to pay, not the extent of damages, which was limited according to his means, but an amount far exceeding that."

And with regard to the main question in the case, Coleridge, J., said, "The principle which the cases have established, without any great discrepancy, though there is not entire conformity as to whether the sum agreed upon is to be considered as liquidated damages or a penalty, is to ascertain what was the real intention of the parties; and the other rules which have been laid down are only to assist us in ascertaining that intention. . . . . The principle to be deduced from all the decisions is, that if the covenant relates to matters which are not of an uncertain nature and amount, as where the covenant is for the payment of a smaller sum, and the damages named in the deed are a much larger sum, the sum stated is to be regarded as a penalty." Crompton, J., said, "It is not necessary to say how far we abide by the decision in Kemble v. Farren, (6 Bing. 140), because we have the strong and direct authority of Atkyns v. Kinnier (4 Exch. 776) upon the construction of the main covenant in this case." (See also Sainter v. Ferguson, 7 C. B. 716).

1. In deciding whether a sum to be paid, in the event of a breach of contract, is to be considered as in the nature of a penalty or as liquidated damages, the real intention of the parties is to be ascertained, and that from the words in the contract itself. Other rules upon the subject are only to assist the Courts in ascertaining such intention.

2. The fact that the sum is large, and exaggerated in amount, does not of itself shew that it is to be considered as a penalty.

3. The fact that more than one thing is to be done or forborne does not determine the question.

4. If the covenant relates to matters which are not of an uncertain nature and amount, e. g. for payment of a smaller sum, and the damages named in the deed are a much larger sum, it is to be regarded as a penalty.

5. And it seems that if some of the stipulations are of a certain nature and amount, and some are of an uncertain nature and amount, as the sum cannot be treated as liquidated damages in respect of one or more of the stipulations, it ought not to be so treated in respect of the others. (Per Coleridge, J.) See Galsworthy v. Strutt, (1 Exch. 659).

6. If the parties intended that there should be a penalty recoverable over and over again for every breach of the covenant, and not that, in case of a single breach, the entire contract should be at an end, and the sum paid for the loss of the whole matter, it will in general be a penalty. (Per Crompton, J.)

7. If there be a contract containing stipulations, the breach of which cannot be measured in damages, the parties must be taken to have meant that the sum agreed on for its non-performance was to be liquidated damages.

RE RACE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—I inclose the "Monthly Letter" of "The Protestant Alliance," No. 30. You will see that it contains a statement that "the girl Alicia Race has been confided to Protestant guardians by the Court of Chancery, on proof that her mother was an unfit guardian, having married again during the lifetime of her first husband." If this statement is correct, it would seem to dispose of the question recently discussed in your columns, (ante, pp. 77, 87, 92), as to the grounds on which the Vice-Chancellor proceeded in Re Race. But the statement of "The Protestant Alliance" is not very consistent with the assertion of your correspondent, (ante, p. 79), "that there was some attempt to impeach the character of the mother, but we understand the affidavits on that head were taken off the file." And it would appear a somewhat curious doctrine to hold that the question, whether a ward of Court should be brought up in one religion or another, should depend on the fact of the guardian being or not being guilty of criminal conduct. Many persons must be acquainted with the real facts of this interesting case; and as, since the publication of the "Monthly Letter" of "The Protestant Alliance," no motives of delicacy can interfere with the statement of the truth, I hope the real facts of the case may be made known to your readers.

Your obedient servant,

Lincoln's Inn, March 21, 1857. W.

THE VERULAM SOCIETY.—This society has been instituted by articled clerks and other law students, for the purpose of affording means whereby they can meet and associate for the purpose of promoting their professional knowledge, and of insuring, as far as they can, the honourable passing by them of their examinations at the Incorporated Law Society. With this view the society proposes to hold meetings of its members on an enlarged and liberal scale, under the presidency of a competent chairman, for the weekly discussion of moot points of law, and also to form term classes for evening study and examination, under a duly qualified principal. The honorary secretary is Mr. Thomas Francis Peacock, of No. 10, South-square, Gray's Inn.

Review.

A Letter to the Right Hon. the Lord Campbell, proposing Alterations in the holding of Assizes and Sessions, and regulating generally the Sittings of the Courts of Common Law both in and out of Term. By William Adam Mundell, Barrister at Law. Pp. 23.
[Wildy & Sons, 1857.]

This pamphlet, which owes its birth to the appointment of the commission for considering (inter alia) the present constitution of circuits, contains sensible suggestions upon that subject, and also upon Nisi Prius Sittings in London and Middlesex.

"The circuits in England," says its author, "have remained pretty much the same since the reign of Henry III; the terms, although somewhat modified by statute, (11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, c. 70), were in their inception subservient to the feasts of the Church; while the length of the Long Vacation was engendered by the necessities of a people who, engaged for the most part in husbandry of a primitive kind, were during this prolonged period unable to leave the harvest and the subsequent preparation of their winter food to attend the courts. When these things had their rise, the bulk of the civil business was transacted at the sheriff's tourn; the want of a ready communication with the metropolis hindered any great influx of causes, having their venue there, into the superior courts; and the writ of Nisi Prius mitigated the evils of the encroachment of the Courts of Westminster upon the local tribunals, and was a boon to the suitor, since by its operation he had a skilled judge presiding, whose advent saved both the plaintiff and the defendant the expense and inconvenience attendant on a trial remote from their homes. The criminal business was for the most part disposed of by the justices in eyre, or more recently by justices in quarter sessions.

"Times and seasons being alike to a reformed church, and the subdivision of labour producing a like result to nearly all classes, so far as attendance on the courts was concerned, these terms and circuits would doubtless have been long since completely altered, but for the conservative principle which is a constituent element of everything English. Slight changes have indeed been made, but not such as the present state of things requires."

The alterations proposed by Mr. Mundell are the following—that there should be three terms in the year, of about four weeks each, beginning respectively in January, April, and September: that the London Sittings should be altogether abolished: that after the first eight days of each term a puisne judge of each court should sit de die in diem to the end of the term to try common jury causes: that after term there should be a sitting before the chiefs for fourteen business days to try special jury causes—a second court to be held, if necessary, before the puisne judge of any court: that the business of the several courts should be equalised, by distributing the causes amongst them: that the sittings in error should be held during the sittings after term, and be presided over by at least eight judges: and that a judge of each court, other than the one sitting at Nisi Prius, should attend chambers daily during term, and should act indiscriminately for all courts.

Respecting circuits, Mr. Mundell proposes that three should be held in each year, beginning respectively in February, May, and November.

He proposes that the following places should be appointed for the trial of causes and prisoners:—

Carlisle.
Newcastle-upon-Tyne.
Lancaster.
York.

Gloucester.
Reading.
Winchester.
Bristol.

Liverpool,
Manchester, } alternately.
Lincoln.
Chester.
Derby,
Nottingham, } alternately.
Leicester,
Peterborough.
Birmingham.
Bedford.
Shrewsbury.

Exeter.
Brighton.
Maidstone.
Ipswich,
Norwich, } alternately.
Chelmsford,
Carmarthen.
Brecon.
Bangor.
Monmouth.

"I offer," he says, "this list but as an approximation to what would be desirable. The two elements for consideration should be population and the facility of transit to the given place from the included district. The districts to be assigned to these places would necessarily include several counties, and sometimes parts of three or more several counties; the whole jurisdiction of counties of cities and towns should be absorbed."

Mr. Mundell is also of opinion that common jurors should be paid for their services, and a power be vested in judges of allowing the costs of witnesses called for prisoners. Upon these subjects he says—

"As jurymen under the new arrangement would be called a greater distance from their homes, it would be imperative that they should no longer travel at their own charges. I have never been able to understand why they have been compelled to do so hitherto. The reasons which necessitated their attendance as the pares of the lord's and afterwards of the king's court have long since ceased to operate. Witnesses are paid either by the parties or out of the consolidated fund; jurymen, if necessary to a trial, ought in like manner to be paid. In most counties eighty form a panel: a payment to each juror of 7*s.* a day, with a reasonable amount for travelling expenses, would form but a small item in the annual expenditure of this great country, and would go far to reconcile the class from which jurymen are selected to what is now considered as an irksome and harassing duty; nor would it be unreasonable to make each cause pay a sum of two guineas to a jury upon the trial.

"As prisoners would also be removed for trial to a distance from their homes, it would be but a fair measure of justice to allow judges the power of ordering the costs of witnesses called by prisoners to be paid as costs of the prosecution. This should extend both to witnesses to character and to facts. This power would not be imperative upon the Court, and there is but little doubt that by the exercise of a wise discretion the judges would hinder the privilege from degenerating into abuse. If calling witnesses by the prisoner either elicits truth, or, by fairly and properly introducing character as an element, enables the jury to form a right judgment on the facts, it is hardly just that the expense should fall on the accused."

Such are the main outlines of Mr. Mundell's scheme; he supports it by various arguments, for which we must refer our readers to the pamphlet itself, as also for his plan relating to quarter sessions, which he proposes should be held, as now, four times a year, but at different periods, and be presided over by paid chairmen.

No doubt more frequent circuits and sittings would do much to restore business to the superior courts, which now finds its way to county courts; and, with all our love for the Long Vacation, we cannot dissent from Mr. Mundell's proposal to interfere with it.

"The Long Vacation, in this way," he says, "would commence upon the 1st day of July, and terminate upon the 29th day of September; the interval of relaxation, though earlier, would be somewhat longer than at present. But I venture to submit, as a matter of importance to the public, that sittings for a somewhat lengthened period should be held in August, by one judge in each court, for the dispatch of urgent business. Under our present system, though a cause be ripe for trial in about thirty days, it may not be capable of trial for five months. Custom has reconciled lawyers to the contemplation of this anomaly; but its continuance can hardly be justified, more particularly when inferior tribunals are open monthly to the suitor. The length of these sittings should depend upon the entry, and might, perhaps, be limited to the trial of cases specially requiring dispatch; but their adoption would do much to obviate the recourse to trickish pleading, in order to throw suitors over the assizes, which, in the result, robs them not unfrequently of their entire demand, being, in fact, a denial of justice. No doubt the over-worked judge needs relaxation, the exhausted counsel no less indulgence; but the suitor, whose interests should be paramount, requires that during one quarter of the year he should not be compelled to slumber on his rights, unless his claim be capable of being disposed of in the county court, either by its being small in amount, or by an abandonment of the excess. It seems the reverse of reasonable that small claims should be recoverable, while large claims may be lost for want of an active and accessible tribunal. These sittings in the metropolis, conjoined with the power of trial given in the county courts after the parties are at issue in the courts at Westminster, under the 26th section of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, (the last County Court Act), although this is unfortunately limited to cases under 50*l*., would go far to obviate the inconvenience now felt by suitors from the closing of our courts."

And again, upon this subject, he says—

"The advancing the Long Vacation is essential, in order that sufficient time may be given to the Autumn Circuit, and that that circuit may fall at a less inconvenient season of the year. I have not ventured to diminish the length of this interval of relaxation, simply because I believe it would be impossible to effect a change—so strong and inveterate is habit; but I have endeavoured to mitigate the mischiefs arising from it by the introduction of vacation sittings for the dispatch of urgent business. Whether this boon should extend only to urgent business is matter for consideration; in the first instance, it might perhaps be so limited. In local actions with a country venue the third circuit would be of the greatest utility; and these additional sittings, where the venue is transitory, would give great facilities to the mercantile classes. The inconveniences arising from this hiatus in the legal year are well and forcibly pointed out by Mr. Pollock, the judge of the Liverpool County Court, before the commission appointed respecting those courts. I am aware this proposition will be unpalatable to judges and the bar; but as respects the former, if each judge, exclusive of the chiefs of either court, were to act in rotation, they would only be required to sacrifice about three weeks of their Long Vacation every fourth year; and as respects the latter, I do not think there would be much difficulty in securing the attendance of a sufficient number to meet the exigencies of clients."

WITCHCRAFT.

Mr. Amos, in his curious and interesting work, "Ruins of Time," places witchcraft, or a belief in it, among the things of the past; but the strange trial at Stafford last week has converted the "ruin" into a comfortable and modern farm-house in Staffordshire. The faith which the farmer and his family had in the "wise man's" assertion, that everything, from the master and mistress to the cheese-kettle, was bewitched, the payment of 3*s*. 6*d*. per head for pigs and 5*s*. for the baby in order that the enchantment might be removed from them, the struggles between the wizard and his professional brethren before he could overcome them, the fiery dog disappearing through the keyhole, and the other dog standing on its hind legs with its tongue out of its mouth "a quarter of a yard long," have been fully described in the public journals, and need not be dwelt upon by us. Approaching the subject in a more professional spirit, we lay before our readers some extracts on this subject from the book to which we have referred, and which possess a peculiar interest in consequence of the recent trial, and also of the fact that a belief in witchcraft still prevails to a wide extent among the lower orders, especially in agricultural districts. Mr. Amos thus writes—

"On the subject of witchcraft, Sir M. Hale states at length the statute of James, who had felt himself aggrieved by witches detaining him with contrary winds when he made his romantic expedition in search of his Queen. The statute comprises five branches that were capital for the first offence—as for example, to feed an evil spirit or suckle imps; and five more that were capital for the second offence—as for example, charms to provoke unlawful love. In the play of 'Ignoramus,' acted before King James at Cambridge, there are various allusions to the popular superstition concerning witches; and the language of an indictment is put into the mouth of Ignoramus, who accuses Polla—'Tu equitas in aere super broomas et baculos;' and, in reference to an ancient notion mentioned by Shakspeare* and in Hudibras, he says, 'Sed si possum trahere sanguinem de eâ primum non curo: adventurabo; non audeo; immo audeo.'

"A statute of Elizabeth against witches had preceded that of James. In a sermon preached by Jewel before the Queen, the bishop says, 'Witches and sorcerers within these last few years are marvellously increased within your Grace's realm. These eyes have seen most evident and manifest marks of their wickedness. Your Grace's subjects pine away even unto the death; their colour fadeth, their flesh rotteth, their speech is benumbed, their senses are bereft. Wherefore your poor subjects' most humble petition to your Highness is, that the laws touching such malefactors may be put into execution; for the shoal of them is great, their doing horrible, their malice intolerable, their examples most miserable; and I pray God they never practise further than upon a subject!' King James, in pursuance of his retaliation against the Lapland witches and their sisterhood, writes that he undertook his work on Dæmonology on account of the 'fearful abounding of those slaves of the devil, witches and enchanters.' Lord Bacon in his Natural History relates, without comment, that 'the ointment which witches use is reported to be made from the fat of children dragged out of their graves'—a superstition similar to that noticed by Shakspeare—

"'Finger of birth-strangled babe,
Ditch delivered by a drab,
Make the gruel thick and slab.'

"The belief of witches, and a general notion of its being fit to punish them with death, is prevalent in the East Indies. In Macnaghten's Adawlut Reports several cases occur of trials relating to witchcraft. In the case of Rungoaah and six others, in 1821, the prisoners were convicted in the Nizamut Adawlut of murdering a woman on suspicion of being a witch: a regular trial of the deceased for witchcraft appeared to have taken place by the inhabitants of her village. In Injeet Sing's case, in 1822, the prisoner was the head of a village; he had a sick child, whose illness he imputed to the incantations of the prosecutor's wife; he therefore confined the woman in the stocks; a few days afterwards she was found hanging by her neck to a tree. There are no less than ten decisions in the first five volumes of the Nizamut Adawlut Reports concerning charges of murder for killing persons on the alleged ground of being witches or sorcerers. In one of the cases, Churrun, the prisoner, murdered the deceased under the impression that he had transformed himself into a tiger and carried off the prisoner's daughter. The prisoner was sentenced only to imprisonment for seven years. This was in 1833.

---

* "Talbot, in 'Henry VI,' says to the Maid of Orleans—
'Blood will I draw of thee; thou art a witch.'

"On the subject of evidence, Sir M. Hale observes, that very young people, under twelve years of age, are sometimes examined without oath, 'which possibly, being fortified with concurrent evidences, may be of some weight, as in cases of rape, witchcraft, and such crimes as are practised on children." Dalton, a high legal authority, often quoted with respect by Coke and Hale, lays down the following rules respecting evidence on prosecutions for witchcraft:—'Spectral evidence, i. e. the afflicted parties, thinking they see the persons who torment them, may be given in evidence. Insensible parts and teats are signs of witchcraft. The devil's mark is like a flea-bite; imps may be kept in pots or other vessels, and the pots or places in which they are kept stink detestably, and therefore such stinking places in a house are signs that imps are kept.' An inability to read the Lord's prayer forwards has been supposed an infallible test of witchcraft. It is a curious part of the history of prosecutions for this offence, that many old women have been terrified into confessions of their familiarity with the devil.

"At a trial of two witches hanged at Lincoln for bewitching a child of the Earl of Rutland, (the child's monument is preserved), part of the evidence was, that one of the alleged witches rubbed her cat with a handkerchief belonging to the child, and bade her 'fly and go;' to which the cat answered 'Mew.' On the trial of the witches of Warbois, at Huntingdon, (on which occasion the prosecutors gave a considerable sum to Queen's College, Cambridge, for an annual sermon against witchcraft), it was part of the evidence against the prisoners that one of the bewitched persons dreamt of a cat. King James was of opinion that the reason of there being more witches than wizards was, because the serpent, after the seduction of Eve, found himself 'homelier' with the female sex. The lively Harrington accounted for the supposed phenomenon to the King by suggesting that the devil was naturally partial to old women, because it is written, 'he walketh in dry places.'

"The celebrated trial before Sir M. Hale of two old women for witchcraft took place at Bury in the year 1665. Rose Callender and Amy Duny, widows, were tried before him for bewitching seven people, and assuming for the purpose various shapes, as those of a bee and a mouse; but collateral evidence was given of bewitching two carts, a chimney, and a firkin of fish. The provocation alleged for the malice of the supposed witches was the refusal of some herrings, very much like that resented by Shakspeare's witch—'A sailor's wife had chesnuts in her lap, and mounched, and mounched, and mounched. "Give me one," quoth I. "Aroint, thou witch," the rump-fed ronyon cries—I'll do, I'll do, I'll do.'

"Among the other absurdities at this trial, an experiment was tried of the supposed witches being made to touch the persons bewitched, whereupon they would suddenly shriek out, and open their hands, which were before clenched, that would not happen on the touch of any other person; and again, they were blinded by their own aprons, and yet the touching took the same effect as before. Upon an ingenious person suggesting that there might be a fallacy in the experiment, Lord Cornwallis, Mr. Serjeant Keeling, and some other gentlemen in court were deputed to examine one of the distempered women, together with one of the supposed witches, in the further part of the hall. An apron was put before the eyes of the woman said to be bewitched, and then another person, not one of the accused, touched the woman's hand, 'which produced the same effect as the touch of the witch did in court.' Whereupon the reporter, though evidently a believer in witchcraft, adds, 'The gentlemen returned openly protesting that they did believe the whole transaction of this business was a mere imposture.' In the course of the trial Sir M. Hale asked (what would be an extraordinary question in the present day) Sir T. Brown, author of the 'Vulgar Errors,' what he thought of the transaction; who gave his opinion that the children were bewitched; thus countenancing the most pernicious of those errors which he wrote a book to explode.

"Sir M. Hale declined repeating the evidence to the jury, 'lest he should wrong one side or other,' but observed that there was no doubt of there being such creatures as witches, according to the testimony of the Scriptures and the laws of all nations, and particularly the act of Parliament of King James.

"The prisoners were convicted on Thursday afternoon, March 13, 1665. The next morning the three children that had been bewitched came to Sir M. Hale's lodging in as good health as ever they were; and their friends were asked at what time they were restored to their speech and health? Whereupon 'Mr. Pacy did affirm, that within less than half an hour after the witches were convicted they were all of them restored, and slept well that night, feeling no pain; only Susan Callender felt a pain like pricking of pins in her stomach.' The two old women were executed on Monday, the following 17th March. On the next Sunday, Sir M. Hale wrote a 'Meditation' (afterwards published) 'upon the Mercy of God in preserving us from the Malice and Power of Evil Angels;' 'in which,' says Lord Campbell, 'he refers with extreme complacency to the trial over which he presided at Bury.'

"It can scarcely be admitted, as a palliation of Sir M. Hale's conduct with regard to the Bury witches, that he acted in conformity with law, and in an age comparatively unenlightened; for his conclusion upon the evidence in the case cannot be reconciled with ordinary unprejudiced judgment; and besides, the opinions of philosophers, like Hobbes, his contemporaries on the bench, were not all equally disposed to judaise.

"Roger North writes of Lord Keeper Guildford—'In trials of some criminals whose cases proved very obscure or doubtful, especially if they were capital, he was infinitely scrutinous; but never more puzzled than when a popular cry was at the heel of a business; for then he had his jury to deal with, and if he did not tread upon eggs, they would conclude sinistrously; and for this reason he dreaded the trying of a witch. It is seldom that a poor old witch is brought to trial on that account but there is at the heels of her a popular rage, that does little less than demand her to be put to death; and if a judge is so clear and open as to declare against that impious vulgar opinion, that the devil has power to torment and kill innocent children, or that he is pleased to divert himself with the good people's butter, cheese, eggs, pigs, and geese, the countrymen (the triers) cry, "This judge hath no religion, for he doth not believe in witches;" and so, to shew that they have some, hang the poor wretches.'

"After mentioning several trials of witches, Roger North relates the particulars of the trial of a wizard for bewitching a girl thirteen years old, who, when he was brought near her, vomited straight pins, which could not be so well concealed in the mouth as crooked ones, which were usually vomited in such cases. It was shewn that the girl, in doubling herself under a pretended fit, took the pins with her mouth out of the end of her stomacher. On Lord Guildford going out of court after this trial, an hideous old woman cried, 'God bless your Lordship! Forty years ago they would have hanged me for a witch, but they could not, and now they would have hanged my poor son.' Lord Holt tried ten cases for witchcraft, in all of which the prisoners were acquitted. Before him was also, in 1703, tried a case the converse of that tried by Sir M. Hale. One Hathaway was tried for pretending that a woman had bewitched him, and caused him to fast, among other injuries, and that, having a presentiment that if he drew the witch's blood he should recover, he scratched her face and recovered on the spot. For attempting the woman's life by an imputation of witchcraft, he was punished with pillory, fine, and imprisonment, as an impostor.

"In the reign of George II all prosecutions for enchantment, sorcery, or conjuration were abolished by statute. Fifteen years after the passing of that law, in 1751, three persons were tried at Hertford for drowning Ruth Osborne in a pond as a witch. A notice had been published in the following terms:—'This is to give notice, that on Monday next a man and woman are to be publicly ducked at Tring, in this county, for their wicked crimes.' The pond was two feet and a half in depth, and the not sinking was considered conclusive proof of witchcraft. One of the prisoners was executed, and afterwards hanged in chains. The multitudes who assembled to see the execution muttered it was a hard case to hang a man for freeing the country of a witch. Eight years afterwards, in 1759, at Wingrove, in Hertfordshire, an old woman of the name of Susannah Hannokes was in peril of drowning for bewitching a spinning-wheel, but was saved by challenging to be weighed against the Bible. She was accordingly weighed nearly naked in one scale, and the parish Bible in the other, all in the parish church; she owed her life to her preponderance. So late as 1825 a man sixty-seven years old 'swam for a wizard,' in the presence of several hundreds of persons, in the parish of Wickham Skeith, in Suffolk.

"Disgraceful as the popular superstition concerning witches has proved to our judicial annals, it has embellished our national literature in numerous instances; it still holds possession of our stage in Macbeth, and in the exclamation of Richard III—

"'Look how I am bewitched! Behold, mine arm

THE REPORT OF THE REGISTRATION OF TITLE COMMISSIONERS.

This Report* extends to forty-seven folio pages. The greater part of it is devoted to a discursive criticism of the present mode of making out and proving title to land in England, the existing systems of registration for various purposes in England and Ireland, (the registration of deeds in Scotland not being alluded to), and the various plans for registration of title that have been proposed.

The scheme for a registration of assurances which was matured by Mr. Duval and the late Registration Commissioners is rejected by the present commissioners, as being likely to aggravate the evils of the existing system. We think they are right in preferring a registration of title; but we are satisfied that the objections to Mr. Duval's system have been much exaggerated, and that it might be adopted with advantage, if a better system could not be devised. The commissioners recommend a plan for registering title which is substantially the same as that of Mr. R. Wilson.

The Report only describes the leading features of the proposed plan in very general terms; but there is a reference to a bill drawn by Mr. W. D. Lewis, which, differing in some respects from the recommendations of the commissioners, is stated to agree with them altogether in principle.

It is proposed that before the adoption of the system throughout England and Ireland, an experiment shall be made in a single county or district; and the selection of a district in Ireland, where the existing registry and the proceedings of the Incumbered Estates Court seem to afford facilities for the change, is recommended.

For some years at least registration is to be optional; but the title to an estate once placed upon the registry is ever afterwards to depend upon the entries in the register. Vendors or purchasers, who are willing to pay an insurance premium to the Government, may have an official investigation of title at their own expense, and, if the title is approved, a warranty which will give them an indefeasible title to the land; and any persons damnified by such warranty are to be compensated in money by the Government. This warranty of title is not, however, put forward as an essential part of the scheme.

In the case of an ordinary registration without warranty, any person applying to have his title to any specific property entered on the registry for the first time must declare on oath that he is in the actual enjoyment of the rents and profits, and believes himself to be entitled in fee-simple, either without incumbrance, or subject to any specified incumbrances, and must also produce, when it can be done, the last instrument of conveyance of the fee, or such other evidence as the registrar may find it necessary to require in order to exclude fraudulent claims; and the registrar may, if it is thought necessary to the same end, give any public or other notices. On complying with these conditions the applicant will receive a certificate of ownership, stating his name, describing the lands, and referring to the incumbrances, if any, and to the entry in the book of registry.

The registered owner for the time being will, subject to any adverse title existing at the date of registration, (if the title is not warranted), and to any incumbrances or lien which may be afterwards created or disclosed on the register, have the absolute power of disposition of the fee-simple, unless that power is restrained by caveat or injunction under the provisions of the act; and the only title which purchasers and others dealing with the registered owner will have to look to will be his title as it appears on the register.

Partial estates and interests, other than simple mortgages or charges and leases for years, will not be allowed to appear on the register. The exception in favour of charges and leases is not arbitrary. The owner of the fee is not the less regarded as the present owner after he has charged it as a security for a debt, or has committed the possession to a tenant.

After an estate has been placed on the register the anterior title will continue to be investigated by intending purchasers and mortgagees as at present, until the lapse of time renders such a precaution unnecessary; but there will be no investigation of the registered title beyond the entry of the title of the registered owner for the time being.

* The commission is dated on the 18th January, 1854, and directed to the Right Hons. J. H. Walpole and Joseph Napier, the present Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, Sir R. Bethell, and T. E. Headlam, V. Scully, Robert Lowe, W. D. Lewis, H. Drummond, J. E. Denison, R. Wilson, and W. S. Cookson, Esqrs.

The registered owner, when not bound by a caveat or injunction, may transfer his title, by giving up his certificate of title, and directing the registrar to substitute the name of the intended transferee. The commissioners propose that there shall be a deed of transfer in a short and simple form, to be authorised by the act. This is a mere question of names. The transfer will substantially be made on the register, and we do not see how anything can be requisite beyond the surrender of the certificate, the direction to the registrar, and the consequent entry and fresh certificate. All beyond this will be either useless, or matter of contract or covenant between the parties, having no effect on the registered title. If the transfer is confined to a part of the property comprised in the old certificate, the transferor will receive a fresh certificate of title to the residue.

To provide for the devolution of the registered title on death a real representative is to be constituted, who, if the deceased has not otherwise directed, will be the executor, or where there is no acting executor, a person to be appointed by the registrar or a judge.

No purchaser for value from a registered owner is to be affected by notice of unregistered interests; but the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in cases of actual fraud is not to be taken away. Volunteers will be bound by unregistered rights.

Two or more persons may be registered as owners "without survivorship," with the effect of rendering the estate inalienable by the survivor, even as to his own share, until the registrar or other appointed authority has supplied the vacancy or vacancies occasioned by death. This is intended to prevent that misdealing with trust property which in almost every instance in which it does occur is committed by a single trustee.

After giving, in the words of the commissioners, an explanation of the guards which are proposed to be placed upon trust property by means of caveats or inhibitions, we shall make some miscellaneous extracts from the Report, which we think has been prepared on the whole with discretion and sound judgment. But whatever may be thought of the wisdom of the scheme, no one who reads the Report attentively will deny that astuteness at least has prevailed in the councils of its composers:—

"As a further protection, those parties who are entitled to any unregistered interest, which, as the law now stands, would render their concurrence necessary in a sale of the fee, will be at liberty to enter in the registry a caveat or inhibition against the transfer of the registered ownership. This caveat or inhibition may and ought to be of various kinds, or various in its operation, so as to adapt itself to the different circumstances under which it will be required. To prevent abuse it will be lodged at the register office only under proper sanctions, such as the consent of the registered owner, or the order of the Court of Chancery if the registered owner improperly refuse to give his consent; and to secure protection suited to the various conditions of settlements, the caveat or inhibition will be allowed to be so framed as to prohibit the transfer of the registered ownership either for a time specified, or during particular lives, or until the occurrence of a stated event, or without the concurrence of certain parties who for that purpose may be named or referred to as protectors, or under any other condition conformable to law which the parties themselves may think fit to impose. The simple effect of such a provision will be, that as long as the caveat or inhibition remains, the registered ownership cannot be alienated without the permission of those whose consent will be thus rendered necessary; but if all these parties desire a sale, that consent can previously be obtained, and so the purchaser will always be able to contract for the property on the express condition, or with the absolute certainty, that he need not move in the matter until the title has become perfectly clear of the equitable interests thus interposed*.

"When it is remembered that the protection thus afforded to the beneficiaries of land will be greater than that which is now afforded to the beneficiaries of stock or railway shares, there can hardly be a doubt that—taken in connexion with the fact, that, except as against purchasers without fraud, the beneficial interests will continue, as now, to affect the land—these various methods of protection will be found sufficient. If it be suggested that fraud may still be practised, the answer is, that there will still remain the remedy by suit, by injunction, and by account. For it is to be observed, that an unregistered interest will entitle the beneficiary to enforce the performance by the registered owner—not being a purchaser—of such duties as properly ought to be observed and performed by him; and for that purpose, but for that purpose only, those duties will be deemed to be trusts cognisable, like other trusts, in the Court of Chancery, and determined, like other trusts, on the principles of equity.

"Where the registered owner shall be a person named such for the purposes of any settlement, then, as between such registered owner and the beneficiaries interested under the settlement, he will not be at liberty to retain the registered ownership, or to remain on the register as registered owner for any longer period, or under any other circumstances, than, according to the present rules of Courts of equity, he would be entitled to retain the legal estate if he were a trustee of the fee upon trusts similar to the provisions contained in such settlement, and he will be bound to make a grant of the registered ownership to such person as may be named in that behalf by the beneficiaries."

"We have intimated our opinion, that although the compulsory formation of public maps would be open to many and grave objections, yet the use of a map properly authenticated for each individual property, together with the customary verbal description, would probably furnish the best means of describing and identifying the land, and indexing it correctly. To accomplish this object in the fullest manner we accordingly recommend—

"1. That the registrar shall have power to require the description of the registered lands to be stated and set forth in such form and manner as he may deem to be best fitted for the purposes of registration.

"2. That at the time of registration it shall be lawful for the registrar to require the parties applying to be registered as owners of any lands to produce a private map or plan of the lands proposed or intended to be registered; and that such map or plan shall be made on such scale, and contain such particulars for identifying the same with the property registered, as the registrar by any general or special regulation may in that behalf require.

* "It has been suggested that it might be lawful for the parties interested in the trusts of any settlement or will to deposit privately with the registrar a copy of the settlement or will at the time when the lands, which are or may be the subject of such settlement, are entered on the register, with a private instruction that no transfer shall be afterwards made of the registered ownership without the consent of the parties who for the time being may be interested, or who may have power of consenting under the settlement or will, or otherwise than under and in conformity with the powers of the settlement or will."

3. That before the registration of the ownership of any land the private map or plan so produced by the applicant shall in every case be referred to in the description of the lands required to be entered on the register itself.

"4. That the registrar shall also be empowered to require, at the time of registration, that the property proposed or intended to be registered shall contain a reference, in the description given of it, to some public map, to be kept in the registry.

"5. That for that purpose he shall be at liberty to declare that the maps made under the direction of the Master-General of the Ordnance, the tithe commutation maps, or any other maps of the accuracy of which he is satisfied, shall be deemed public maps for the purposes of registration; and if he thinks fit he shall cause copies or reprints of any parts thereof to be made, either on the existing or on an enlarged scale; and such maps as are directed to be used for the purposes of registration shall be deposited in the registrar's office, and copies thereof published and sold in such manner and subject to such provisions as the registrar may direct.

"6. And that as the main object of the public maps will be to facilitate searches and references, the registrar shall be empowered to adapt the maps to the districts created for the purposes of registration, or to form the districts with reference to the number, quality, and description of the available public maps, so that each district may have its own public map or maps, to which the parties seeking for information will be able to refer."

"With regard to incumbrances, we think that the benefits to be derived from registration should be extended to the owners of charges upon the fee of land as fully as to the owners of the fee itself. The registration of charges may properly be subjected to the following rules:—

"1. Every charge intended to be registered shall so be entered on the register as to shew the name of the owner thereof, the lands upon which the same is made, the amount of money secured thereby, the rate of interest payable thereon, and the date of the instrument by which it is created.

"2. Every such charge shall also be entered under some proper sanction, such as the consent of the registered owner to the registration thereof, or the order of a competent Court decreeing or directing the same to be registered.

"3. On the registration of such charge the registered ownership will be subject to the legal rights and powers incident to the charge, and either may be transferred independently of the other.

"4. A certificate of the charge will be given by the registrar to the party applying to register the same.

"5. The priorities of all charges shall be determined exclusively according to the dates of their respective registration.

"6. Unregistered charges shall only take effect as unregistered interests, but may be protected in like manner as unregistered interests.

"The benefit of registration will also be conferred on the owners of leases for the term of twenty-one years and upwards. The registration of leases will be subject to the following rules:—

"1. Every lease intended to be registered shall so be entered as to shew the name of the owner thereof, the length of the term, the date of the lease, and the rent reserved.

"2. Every such lease shall also be entered under some proper sanction, such as the consent of the registered owner, or the order of a competent Court decreeing or directing the same to be registered.

"3. On registering such lease the registered ownership will be subject to the legal rights incident to the lease, and either may be transferred independently of the other.

"4. A certificate of the lease will be given by the registrar to the party applying for the registration of the same.

"The mode of transferring registered charges and registered leaseholds will be similar in all respects, mutatis mutandis, to the mode of transferring the registered ownership; and on the death of the registered owners thereof, their representatives will be entitled to be registered in their place."

"With regard to some miscellaneous questions as to the machinery of the proposed registry, we think that the title deeds should not be required to be delivered up to the registrar; that the registrar should have a general power of determining conflicting claims by consent, or of putting them in a course of judicial determination; that no tenancy in common should be allowed in a registered ownership; that a general power should be given to the registrar of making necessary regulations; and that there should be a difference of fees for large and small transactions.

"With regard, however, to the powers to be intrusted to the registrar, we conceive that, as a general principle, his authority should be ministerial and executive in its nature, and not judicial. We agree in an observation contained in the evidence before us, that there is no feeling more strongly rooted in the public mind than dislike of official interference with their private affairs, and any system must be considered practically impossible, however theoretically perfect, which would render the approval or sanction of a registrar necessary for the completion of transfers, or would give him any discretionary power to prevent them."

"We take leave further to observe, that we think it will be very difficult to deal fully or satisfactorily with the subject of registration of title without making fresh regulations on the subject of the professional remuneration of solicitors. We observe that the Real Property Commissioners also found it necessary to direct their attention to this subject when making their report in favour of the registration of assurances.

"In England a solicitor is allowed to receive such fees only as the judges of the court assign him, and these fees are so devised as to attach to certain portions only of his work, leaving the rest to be done without fee. In matters of conveyancing, the whole trouble of the transaction is principally compensated by fees, assigned according to the length of the various documents. Theoretically, in England, a solicitor is entitled to the same fees for superintending transactions relating to the smallest properties as to the largest. In Scotland, and many foreign countries, the work is principally compensated by a brokerage or commission—a form of remuneration almost universally adopted by the usages of commerce for all other agencies.

"The changes we propose for the transfer of land, without materially altering the nature or extent of the more important services rendered by the solicitor, or the professional superintendence and responsibility involved, will interfere with those particular processes to which the Courts have thought fit almost entirely to attach the solicitor's right to remuneration.

"If, therefore, it is considered desirable to continue to prescribe by law a scale of remuneration for conveyancing business, it would seem right that an opportunity should be given for reconsidering the whole subject of solicitors' fees with reference to conveyancing. The services of solicitors will be necessary in the conveyancing transactions contemplated by the measure we propose, and reliance must still be placed upon their honour and character in performing the important duties and incurring the responsibilities which will still attach to every transfer."

Insurances expiring at Lady-day should be renewed within fifteen days thereafter, at the Offices of the Society, or with any of its Agents throughout the country.

This Society holds itself responsible under its Fire Policy for any damage done by explosion of gas. E. BLAKE BEAL, Secretary.

ROYAL INSURANCE COMPANY.—Notice is hereby given, that this Company has returned to its Offices, (which have been rebuilt), No. 29, Lombard-street, at the corner of Clement's-lane. Offices in Liverpool—Royal Insurance-buildings, North John-street, and Dale-street.

FIRE BRANCH.—The Fire premium in 1856 amounted to about 150,000*l*., placing the Company among the very largest offices in the kingdom; indeed, it is believed that there are only three or four offices which equal it in fire revenue. Insurances are received upon nearly all descriptions of property in the United Kingdom, the Colonies, and most Foreign Countries; the rates of premium are exceedingly moderate, and governed in each case by a careful consideration of the risk proposed.

LIFE BRANCH.—The Life revenue during the past year amounted to about 40,000*l*., the new premiums alone exceeding 10,000*l*. A bonus was declared in 1854 of 2*l*. per cent. per annum on the sum insured, averaging about 80*l*. per cent. of the premiums paid, being one of the largest ever declared. All the insurances effected during the present year will participate in the next bonus in 1859.

The paid-up and invested Capital, including Life Funds, amounts to nearly Half a Million sterling.

BETTS'S PATENT BRANDY has ever since its introduction to the public been recognised, both by scientific men and the trade, as the best article ever manufactured in this country. Its claims to such pre-eminence are based upon its unrivalled purity, and its closer assimilation than any other to the flavour of the finest Champagne Brandy.

There has been no Brandy made from wine in France either in the present year or in the preceding one. Owing to the successive failures in their vintages, the French wine-grower gets a higher price for his wine, consumed as such, than he can realise by its being distilled into Brandy; and forasmuch as the Foreign Brandy of recent importations is but the product of British grain and beet-root spirits, the prestige hitherto exclusively enjoyed by French Brandy as having been distilled from a particular French wine no longer exists, and is no longer worthily assignable to it now that it is bunglingly made from other materials. The supply of wine for distillation into Brandy having failed, the French distiller is constrained to recur to a manufacture in which he needs the quarter of a century's experience which has been exercised upon that of BETTS'S PATENT BRANDY, to render his article respectably competitive, and he has not had it. Under these circumstances the Messrs. BETTS challenge that their PATENT BRANDY is superior to any now made abroad.

It is to the interest of the public and the Messrs. Betts that these facts should be widely spread, for recent importations are of a quality so inferior as to disgrace the name they bear, and are twice the price of BETTS'S PATENT BRANDY, which is supplied by the trade to private families in any quantity, down to the single capsuled bottle. Excise regulations prevent its sale from the DISTILLERY, 7, SMITHFIELD-BARS, ST. JOHN-STREET, in any less quantity than two gallons.

LONDON, APRIL 4, 1857.

THE subject of trade-marks was lately considered by the Lord Chancellor in the case of Farina v. Silverlock, (2 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1008; 26 L. J., Ch., 11). The right to have a particular trade-mark to designate a commodity was said by his Lordship not to be "properly described as a copyright, because it is no right at all, unless it is a right which can be said to exist only and to be tested only by its violation. It is a right on the part of any person designating his wares or commodities by a particular trade-mark, as it is called, to prevent anybody else from selling wares which are not those manufactured by the plaintiff with that trade-mark, in order to mislead the public, and so incidentally to injure the person who is owner of the trade-mark. . . . . Anybody who has acquired a particular mode of designating his particular manufacture has a right to say, not that other persons shall not sell exactly the same article, better or worse, or looking exactly like it, but that they shall not so sell it as to steal the plaintiff's trade-mark, and make purchasers believe it is the manufacture of somebody else. . . . . The gist of a trade-mark in an action at law would be this—that the defendant had sold, as and for the manufacture of the plaintiff, something that was not his manufacture; and this supposed spurious label is put on in order to make it more apparent that it is his manufacture."

The facts of the case before the Lord Chancellor were these:—A printer had been in the habit of printing and selling labels containing the trade-mark of Johann Maria Farina, the well-known manufacturer of eau de Cologne. An injunction had been granted to restrain such printing and selling, but it was now in effect dissolved by the Lord Chancellor, upon the ground that the evidence disclosed a legitimate object for which these labels might be applied by retail dealers, namely, to put on bottles containing the genuine eau de Cologne of the plaintiff. This they did either by replacing soiled labels, or by putting them on smaller bottles than those in which they had bought the eau de Cologne. With respect to this part of the case the Lord Chancellor said, "It seems to me clear, that any man who had got any of the eau de Cologne of Johann Maria Farina, and had not got a label, might employ any printer he thought fit to print or engrave for him a label which should be an exact counterpart of that which was used by Farina. There is no copyright in it. All that the law restrains a person from doing is selling the article which is not the manufacture of Farina with the label of Farina upon it. But if it be the article which has been manufactured by Farina, he must not complain that the person sells it with something upon it to represent his trade-mark, though it is not a genuine trade-mark." (See also Rodgers v. Nowell, 5 C. B. 109).

We may here refer to a somewhat curious case, in which an analogous claim was set up, the plaintiff asserting that he had obtained an exclusive right to the use of the name "Bank of London" for his bank. The declaration alleged that he had established a bank with this name at great expense, and had caused the name to be published, and it was the only bank known by that name; that the defendants fraudulently established another bank under the name of "The Bank of London," in imitation of and as representing that of the plaintiff, and fraudulently transacted business there under the false colour and pretence that it was the bank of the plaintiff, whereby he was deprived of profits, and the public were deceived. On demurrer it was held that the declaration did not disclose a cause of action, as it did not allege that the plaintiff had ever carried on the business of a banker at the bank he had established. (Lawson v. The Bank of London, 2 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 716). Willes, J., there said, "With respect to actions for the fraudulent use of a trade-mark, if no use had ever been made of such mark by the plaintiff, the action, I believe, could not be maintained." And Jervis, C. J., said, "All that appears is, that the plaintiff had gone to some expense with reference to establishing a certain bank, and that somebody else had beaten him in the race of competition, and had established another bank under the same name as the plaintiff's bank."

Commentaries on the Laws of England. In Four Books. By Sir WILLIAM BLACKSTONE. A new Edition, adapted to the present State of the Law. By ROBERT MALCOLM KER, LL.D., Barrister at Law. [Murray, 1857.]

THIS is a useful working edition of the Commentaries, not overladen with notes nor disfigured by brackets. The old arrangement of Blackstone is preserved, and modern law has been carefully and skilfully incorporated. For the purpose of extract, we do not know any portion of the book so suitable or so interesting to our readers as the continuation of the history of the law in the last chapter, bringing it up to the present time.

"Nearly a century," writes Mr. Ker, "has elapsed since the Commentaries of Sir William Blackstone were first published. Much as the learned and enthusiastic commentator had cause for exultation in the improvements which had been introduced in his own times, and those immediately preceding, he would have found matter for still warmer panegyric had he lived in our days. The events of the last hundred years have changed the face of Europe; and although our own country has not sustained those disastrous shocks which have been felt from time to time by most of the continental nations, it has not remained a stranger to the general progressive tendency which has been discernible, more or less, over the whole civilised world. On the contrary, the state of continuous healthy progress, which seems to be almost peculiar to our own institutions, has, perhaps, carried us further, in the direction of political and social freedom, than any other nation in the world.

"Among the first and most important constitutional changes to be mentioned was the union of the British and Irish Legislatures—an event which may be regarded as the foundation of that genuine union of interest and feeling between two nations intimately allied by geographical position, common language, and similar institutions, which, if not yet completely attained, seems now at least in a fair way of becoming permanently established. The statute amending the representation of the people in the Commons' House of Parliament, popularly known as the Reform Act, introduced no new principle into the constitution, but simply restored to the great body of the people that ancient right of self-government which they had derived from their Saxon ancestors. Another statute, of almost equal importance, of which the professed object was the restoration of an ancient institution, was that which remodelled the municipal corporations, and removed the many abuses which had gradually crept into these bodies. Several statutes have also been passed for preventing corrupt practices in the election of members to serve in Parliament, and for disfranchising the boroughs where such practices were found to prevail.

"Our civil liberties have been further secured by that amendment of the law of libel which has vested in the jury the right in such cases of deciding as well upon the law as upon the fact, and by the statutory recognition of the privilege of Parliament to publish whatever it pleases. The boundaries of religious liberty have been extended by the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts—a measure which has enabled that numerous and influential portion of our fellow-citizens who object to the discipline or dissent from the doctrines of the Established Church to participate in those political rights from which they had been before excluded; whilst the Catholic Emancipation Act has relieved those who adhere to the Church of Rome from the civil disabilities and penalties to which they were previously subject. The National Church has probably taken strength from the commutation of tithes, and still more from those statutes which have been passed for the abolition of pluralities, and for compelling the residence of the beneficed clergy. Large and comprehensive measures have also been adopted for the better management and application of the cathedral revenues, and for the subdivision of large and populous parishes, the formation of new parochial districts, and the extension of the church and its institutions. A committee of the Privy Council has been formed for the distribution of the large sums which have for many years been annually voted by Parliament for promoting education among the poorer classes of the people.

"The statutes amending the law of marriage, while requiring this important ceremony to be accompanied in all cases by certain circumstances of publicity and notoriety, have at the same time enabled every individual to enter into this solemn contract in the mode which he considers necessary or proper, and have thus removed an unreasonable restriction under which a large portion of the community previously laboured.

"The abolition of colonial slavery, accomplished at a very great pecuniary sacrifice, is an event in our history never to be forgotten. The spirit of philanthropy which dictated this measure is a very prominent feature of our age, and has displayed itself in a variety of other enactments, particularly those modifying the severity of the laws relating to unfortunate traders and debtors, securing the proper care and treatment of lunatics, amending the discipline of prisons, and providing reformatory institutions for all criminals who seek an opportunity of regaining their lost position. The laws for the relief of the poor have been remodelled; the numerous charities which are to be found in every part of the kingdom have been placed under the regulation and control of a body of commissioners, whose sole duty it is to see that the funds of these institutions are properly applied; the laws relating to game, always a fertile source of crime, have been so far modified that we may anticipate an early repeal of all penal enactments on the subject; and several statutes have been passed having for their object the improvement of the sanatory condition of populous places and the preservation of the public health.

"The interests of trade, commerce, and manufactures have been unceasingly studied and promoted since the restoration of peace in 1815. This is not the place, however, in which to attempt any enumeration of the various statutes which have been from time to time passed for regulating these matters, the legislation relating to which has been often affected and controlled by financial necessities, or by the conflicting views of political economists. It may be enough to allude to the statutes throwing open the trade to the East Indies, to the consolidation of the laws relating to the mercantile marine, and the repeal of the Navigation Acts—all tending towards establishing a system of commerce free from all restraints other than those which the collection of the public revenue, and the machinery required for that purpose, render indispensable. The laws with regard to bankrupts have been consolidated and amended, and courts established for the relief of all insolvent debtors whatever; real property has been subjected to the payment of debts; the rights of authors and inventors have been extended and secured; and the formation of joint-stock companies has been simplified and cheapened, the most ample regulations being made at the same time for the guidance of these bodies. The operations of the mercantile classes have been facilitated by several statutes having reference exclusively to commercial affairs, and protected, to some extent, by other enactments, which have made breaches of trust, committed by bankers, factors, agents, and servants generally, severely punishable.

"In regard to landed property, and its transmission, the most important improvements have taken place. The alteration of the law of descent, the limitation of the time within which actions for the recovery of real estate may be brought, the shortening of the time of prescription or legal memory, the abolition of those complex modes of assurance, fines and recoveries, the modification of the wife's claim of dower, the annihilation of satisfied terms—these, among other things, have tended greatly to facilitate the transfer of property, have got rid of endless doubts and difficulties which perpetually arose upon titles, and have materially shortened conveyances. A great improvement has also been introduced into the law of wills, and there is less danger now than formerly of the wishes of a testator being frustrated. An attempt has been made to get rid of copyhold tenures, and repeated efforts, hitherto without effect however, to introduce a system of registration of the titles to real estates.

"The administration of justice has been greatly simplified by the numerous alterations which have been made in the procedure of the superior courts of law and equity. The abolition of real actions, and of the many fictions which formerly encumbered suits at law, was an important and beneficial change, but not so advantageous to the suitor as more recent improvements in the practice of the courts at Westminster. Even these alterations have been less beneficial to the great mass of the community, however, than the establishment of the new county courts—a measure warmly recommended by Sir William Blackstone, and to some extent a return to the ancient Saxon system, restored, if not established, by King Alfred, for securing the administration of justice at every man's door. The old rules of law excluding the evidence of the parties to the suit, and prohibiting persons who are considered disqualified, either by reason of interest or by crime, from being witnesses, have been repealed, and all practical difficulties in eliciting the truth removed.

"The proceedings in the Court of Chancery have been simplified and shortened; the increase in the number of judges has prevented the possibility of delay in the hearing of causes in that court; and there seems to be no reason why, in ordinary cases, the obtaining of justice in a court of equity should not be a speedy, and not ruinously expensive, process.

"The criminal law has been, as to many of its branches, amended and consolidated, and the severity of punishments at the same time much softened, and adapted more carefully than formerly to the nature and magnitude of the offence. The barbarous sufferings prescribed for those attainted of treason no longer stain the statute-book; and the punishment of innocent parties for ancestral guilt, which often resulted from the doctrine of corruption of blood, can no longer happen; while the offences involving capital punishment, which the convict only escaped by claiming the benefit of clergy, have been gradually reduced in number, until the extreme penalty of the law has become in practice confined to the frightful crime of murder. The trial by battle, and the mode of proceeding by appeal, have been formally abolished; the law relating to principal and accessory has been divested of its niceties; and the forms of the proceedings in the criminal courts so far simplified and improved, that offenders, who have now the advantage of being defended by counsel, rarely escape punishment on purely technical objections."

Letters to John Bull, Esq., on Lawyers and Law Reform. By Joshua Williams, of Lincoln's-inn, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. 12mo., pp. 87. [Sweet.]

This book is scarcely within our jurisdiction. Mr. Williams explains his object in a few prefatory words:—"People who wonder at lawyers, at what they do and at what they object to, sometimes merely want a little information. This I have endeavoured to supply in as plain and pleasant a manner as I could. I have tried to write pleasantly, wishing to be read; and plainly, wishing to be understood." As lawyers, we and our readers have merely to see, before we recommend these Letters to our lay friends, that Mr. Bull's correspondent, in seeking to explain, has not misrepresented us. There is no startling originality in his remarks; we should mistrust them if there were; but he has expressed what in our judgment is, for the most part, the common sense of the Profession—that is, of the thinking and well-informed members of it; and he has succeeded in writing plainly and pleasantly by writing naturally, without striving after the unattainable felicities of the great master in the style he has chosen.

There are eleven Letters, none of them longer than those we are in the habit of exchanging with our friends. We are not satisfied with the advice given to Mr. Bull in the first, (on professional remuneration), that he should abolish taxation of costs, and trust his attorney to send in a reasonable bill; and if he overcharges, let twelve honest men in a jury-box decide between them. The twelve men must decide either in the dark or in the light. If in the dark, they would be an expensive and clumsy substitute for the present counting machine. If it is possible to shew them a light, the decision of a single honest expert, with the same aid, would be more ready and satisfactory. When we bring an action must there be a jury to try the cause, and then a jury to settle the costs? The difficulty is to discover a principle of charging that will be at once practicable and reasonable.

The second letter treats of the mischievous effect of the existing system of costs on the character of attornies.

In the third letter a few pithy words suffice to expose the flimsy texture of the scenery with the aid of which the Benchers of the Inns of Court have achieved what we trust is but a temporary success for the new farce of "Legal Education."

In the fourth letter the duty of the advocate is defined, and distinguished on the one hand from that of the judge and jury, and on the other from the license which Lord Brougham has been wrongly accused of claiming, but which, in two or three notorious cases, has been unhappily taken in practice.

The fifth letter, on the drawing of acts of Parliament, may be read with advantage by many lawyers. In private practice, it is the exception if a lawyer is employed to do any work of importance for which he has not, by sufficient natural gifts and practice, a special aptitude. We do not ask Mr. Hayes to defend a prisoner, nor Sir F. Thesiger to draw a marriage settlement; but in the transaction of that business of universal concern which is proverbially nobody's business it seldom happens that aptitude of any kind is thought of; still less aptitude for the matter in hand. A list of the lawyers in the late Parliament who have made what in the slang of the day is termed "capital" of law reform and their misdeeds ought to make John Bull blush for his simplicity, and to draw forth an indignant protest from all honest and competent lawyers. "Depend upon it you cannot have a first-rate article unless you pay a good price. It is an exceedingly difficult thing to draw an act of Parliament. A good draftsman may blunder—a bad one must. Think, however, of the expense and anxiety of a law-suit. How many law-suits must be gone through in order to fix the meaning of an ill-drawn act! Would you yourself like to be plaintiff or defendant in some celebrated suit of Bull versus Bull, in which the meaning of some blundering act was laid down by the judges? Be not penny wise and pound foolish. Get not only lawyers, but the best lawyers; and not only the best lawyers, but the men most accustomed to the composition of legal documents, and the most skilled therein; pay them such a price as you must pay if you employ them at all; and your legislation, instead of being an annoyance and a disgrace, will be a source of satisfaction and credit. Is not all this perfectly true, and plainly reasonable? Why, then, not act upon it?" (P. 35*). The subject is continued in the sixth letter, on conveyancers.

In his seventh letter, on the transfer of land, Mr. Williams unconsciously illustrates, as we think, the connexion between common sense and prejudice. He distrusts the present Registration Commission because it has not a pure conveyancer among its members†; and, evidently without having given the matter any deliberate attention, he disposes of the important question of registration by addressing his "gullible" friend in the following style:—"Now, if you are willing to give up settling, and give up leasing, and to go back to a rather primitive state of things, you may, by machinery of registration, in somewhat less than a century's time, make the transfer of landed property wonderfully simple. But if you are not willing to do this, you must patiently submit to bear the expense which the facility and security of disposition you now enjoy inevitably bring."

The eighth letter, on "primogeniture," should have been addressed to Mr. Locke King. We do not believe that John Bull is likely to make any serious mistake about the matter.

The absurdity of our rules for the administration of assets in the payment of debts is very well exposed in the ninth letter, which concludes with a recommendation that there should be but two kinds of debts—those secured by some specific charge, (i. e. a charge on specific property), and those unsecured by any charge or priority.

The two last letters are on appeals in Chancery, and the reformation of criminals.

* See some observations on the subject in 1 Jur., N. S., part 2, p. 349.

SIR,—In the article which appeared in your number of the 21st March, respecting the necessity of inrolling conveyances to burial boards, I think you have not given sufficient weight to the opinion of Lord Eldon as opposed to that of Sir John Leach. In The Attorney-General v. Brown (1 Swanst. 297) his Lordship says, "It seems to have been considered, that because the duty was given by act of Parliament, it could not be a charitable use. If authority was wanted upon that subject, it would be enough for my business to-day to refer to the passage cited from Duke's 'Exposition of the Statute of Elizabeth.' After the fire of London acts of Parliament imposed a duty on coal imported into the city or river, among other purposes, for rebuilding St. Paul's church. Beyond a doubt that was a charitable use. Money given by a private donor for repairing a church or chapel is a charitable use; and if this is law, there is no reason why money given by the public, if it is applied to a charitable purpose, should not be equally within the statute of Elizabeth." His Lordship seems here distinctly to repudiate the notion, that because the fund is collected by a compulsory process, and is not given by the contributors with a charitable intent, therefore it does not constitute a charitable fund. The purpose, and that alone, is to be looked to. In the subsequent case of The Attorney-General v. The Mayor of Dublin, Lord Eldon remarked that the case of The Attorney-General v. Heelis was not reconcileable with the principle of the decision in The Attorney-General v. Brown, and that the research which had been made confirmed the latter case rather than the former. (See 1 Bligh, N. S., 335).

The judgment of Sir John Leach in The Attorney-General v. Heelis is not satisfactory, for he admits, that under a gift by Parliament of a duty on coal to rebuild St. Paul's, the proceeds of the duty formed a charitable fund; while he subsequently denies that the proceeds of a duty levied on the inhabitants of a town in respect of their property, and to be applied in paving and lighting the town, formed such a fund. He calls the first a gift by Parliament; but surely the second is a gift by Parliament also, and can it make any difference whether the object was to build a church or erect gas-lamps?

So far I have assumed that the judgment of Sir John Leach bears the construction you have put upon it; but, in fact, he only denies that rates levied for paving and lighting a town form a charitable fund "to be administered by this Court." Thus, poor rates (the fund from which burial boards pay for their ground) are a charitable fund, though they are not, I presume, subject to be administered by the Court of Chancery.

To say that to bring any given case within the 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, the money must be contributed not only for a charitable purpose, but with a charitable intent, does not appear consistent with the spirit of the act, the object of which was, not to check charitable intentions, but to check the purchase of land for charitable purposes; otherwise why impose a restriction on the mode of conveyance by a vendor who could have no charitable intent? The provision in the burial acts as to the form of conveyance necessarily repeals so much of the act of Geo. 2 as requires a conveyance to be by indenture, but cannot of itself repeal the other provisions of that act; and any argument derived from this source may be fairly met by the stat. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 73, which provides that conveyances of sites for workhouses need not be made conformably to the stat. 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, and shews the opinion of the Legislature on this subject.

If inrolment is held not necessary, it ought to be on the ground that the board can charge fees for burial. Everybody buys the right of interment, and the case becomes that of an ordinary cemetery company, who merely borrow the necessary capital from the poor rates, and ultimately repay it out of the profits of the burial-ground.

REGULA GENERALIS.

"The importance of maps as forming the best basis for a scheme of registration has been long and often and ably discussed. In 1832 the Real Property Commissioners reported against such a use of maps. In 1850 the Registration Commissioners reported in favour of it; but two of that body, Mr. Humphry and Mr. Broderip, expressed their dissent. In 1850 a bill for the registration of assurances, founded on the report of the last-mentioned commissioners, which recommended maps, was brought into the House of Lords, and referred to a select committee. The select committee, admitting that maps were in theory to be preferred, came at length to the conclusion, that, considering the occasional inaccuracy of the tithe maps, the insufficient scale of the then existing Ordnance maps, and the great delay and expense of a new survey, it would be inexpedient to propose their compulsory adoption in the first instance, but that means should be reserved of introducing them as opportunity occurred. The bill, in consequence, came down to the House of Commons without that portion of it which was founded on the recommendation of maps by the commissioners. In the House of Commons the question was slightly re-opened in 1851, but no opinion was expressed. Under these circumstances we have felt it our duty to take further evidence on it; and we have arrived at the conclusion that a compulsory plan for mapping the whole country would not be attended with sufficient advantages to outweigh the inconveniences which must necessarily attend it. The first inconvenience would be the unavoidable delay that must occur in remapping the kingdom. There are no public maps now in existence which would be sufficient to answer all the purposes of registration. The present scale of the Ordnance maps in England would not be large enough for minute subdivisions of common fields, and for a clear delineation of town districts. The tithe maps would determine the question of parochial boundaries, but not the boundaries of individual proprietors. Such maps might certainly be useful to a considerable extent, but for registration purposes there must be new surveys; the revision of existing maps must be made, and it would probably require two years before the map for any one county could be got ready. Again: the expense would be very considerable. Mr. Blamire says that the maps and references in the Tithe Office have already cost as much as 2,500,000*l.*; and Colonel Dawson estimates at upwards of 1,000,000*l.* the cost of compiling a map of the entire kingdom, partly from maps scientifically constructed, and partly from the revision of other maps to be adopted for the purposes of registration; and this would be independent of the expense which would have to be incurred in settling the boundaries between different proprietors, if such a measure were considered desirable. It appears to us, however, that to compel the formation of a general map of England, with the view of making it evidence of the boundaries of properties, would of necessity open a vast field for litigation and dispute. Questions of disputed boundaries which are now allowed to remain in abeyance must then be settled. The trouble and annoyance thereby occasioned would be harassing in the extreme; and these evils would fall more heavily on small owners than on large proprietors. Every person must defend his extreme rights, for when once the register came into operation they would be barred for ever. To meet so many and such serious inconveniences the corresponding advantages should be clear and positive, certain and immediate; but we doubt very much whether this would be the case under a compulsory obligation to map the boundaries of every proprietor.

"For the reasons before mentioned, we cannot recommend that the compulsory formation of a general map should constitute the basis of a system of registration of title. At the same time we are not insensible to the numerous advantages which a pictorial representation of property and its boundaries must always have as compared with a mere verbal description of it. The verbal description can only state that it contains so many acres, roods, and perches; that it bears such and such names; that it is occupied by this or that tenant; and that it is bounded on the north, south, east, and west by certain specified roads, rivers, buildings, or lands belonging to or in the occupation of certain specified parties. But such a description is not necessarily sufficient to identify the property, or to ascertain correctly its form or shape, or whether the fences or boundary lines are crooked or straight, or to determine what is the general or particular direction of it with regard to the points of the compass. These are matters which a map, constructed upon a basis of triangulation, and according to the principles of science, can best supply as permanent landmarks, accurate at the time when they are originally made, and capable of being restored to their true positions, whatever may be the casual or accidental circumstances by which they may have been disturbed. Although, therefore, for the reasons above given, the compulsory formation of a public map would be open to serious and grave objections, yet the use of a map properly authenticated for each individual estate, and made on a uniform scale, would probably furnish, together with the usual verbal description, the best means of identifying the property, and the clearest mode of indexing correctly the registered title to it. One of the witnesses has observed in his evidence, that 'a map is a good servant, but a bad master; very useful as an auxiliary, but very mischievous if made indispensable.' In this opinion we concur; and while we would deprecate the adoption of maps in any mode, or for any purpose, which would make them binding upon or conclusive of the rights of parties, we would encourage and even require their use in each case, so as to obtain a description and admission of the particular property which the party applying intends to have registered. In furtherance of the same purpose a discretionary power should be given to the registrar for determining how far and under what circumstances any existing public maps might be made available, as well as the scale upon which either the private maps or copies of the public ones should be prepared and employed."

"The remaining question is, whether the register shall be a metropolitan or provincial one, or, in other words, whether it shall be central or local, or both central and local? Or, to put the question more accurately, shall there be—

"One central register for the whole kingdom; or,

"Several county registers for the several subdivisions of the whole kingdom; or,

"One central register for the whole kingdom, with branch offices in the principal towns throughout the kingdom?

"A central register for the whole kingdom would, of course, be established in the metropolis; county registers would probably be in the largest, or most central, or most generally accessible town in the county.

"The advantages of a metropolitan register over county registers have been stated to be the following:—

"1. Under a metropolitan register a uniformity of system throughout the whole kingdom would be established, which would hardly be attainable, or at any rate maintained, in several county registers.

"2. One metropolitan register would be much less expensive than from fifty to sixty county registers; for in each county registry there would necessarily be an efficient registrar, and a deputy competent to discharge the duties of the registrar during his absence from illness or other inevitable cause.

"3. One metropolitan register, under the superintendence of a registrar of high professional attainments and experience, and efficient deputies and subordinate officers, would inspire more confidence on the part of the landowners of the country than several county registers would do.

"4. The registers of judgments, bankruptcies, and insolvencies must necessarily be metropolitan.

"5. The suggested system of distringas would be more efficiently worked, and uniformity of practice would be more securely preserved, in one metropolitan register than in numerous county registers.

"6. A metropolitan register would be less expensive to parties employing solicitors resident in the country. Every solicitor in the country, without exception, has an agent in London, with whom he is in daily confidential unreserved communication, and no additional expense, or the smallest additional expense possible, is occasioned to the client by reason of the employment of a London agent. The remuneration of a solicitor is on a fixed scale; and as to the business transacted by the agent, the remuneration is divided between the agent and country solicitor. They are, as regards the particular transaction, very much in the position of partners residing in different towns. Through his London agent, therefore, the country solicitor might obtain from the metropolitan registry all the required information at the same cost to the client as if the register were in the town where the country solicitor practised. But the country solicitor rarely has a confidential agent in any other place than London, and if he does not reside in the register town, he would be obliged to employ a local solicitor, or to make a journey to the registry, for the purpose of search or registration, and it would often happen, where secresy was desired, that he would find it his duty to incur the expense of a journey.

"7. With county registers it would constantly occur, that solicitors in different parts of the country, as well as solicitors in the metropolis, would have no knowledge of the solicitors in the particular town where the county register might be. Many of the solicitors in large practice in London have clients who are landowners in many of the counties in England, and they would be much inconvenienced and embarrassed by a system of county registers.

"8. The ordinary communication between London and country towns, to say nothing of the telegraph, is often much more rapid and regular than between one country town and another, and of course the postage of letters is the same, whatever the distance may be.

"It has, on the other hand, been urged that the registrar ought to be charged with the duty of ascertaining the accuracy of the description and identity of the land, and that to ensure this a local register would be indispensable, and that a union of the two systems would be at once practicable and desirable.

"With reference, therefore, to the question whether the office should be a single metropolitan office, or whether it should be subdivided into various provincial offices, our opinion is, that both suggestions may be combined with great advantage. The principal office should be situated in London, but local or district registries should be also established."

PROSPECTUS OF THE LECTURES

To be delivered during the ensuing Trinity Educational Term by the several Readers appointed by the Inns of Court.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW AND LEGAL HISTORY.

The Public Lectures to be delivered by the Reader on Constitutional Law and Legal History will comprise the following subjects:—

The Reign of Anne, and the Character of the Government of George I and George II—The Progress of our Jurisprudence—The State Trials, and the Proceedings of Parliament during that Period.

In his Private Classes the Reader will proceed from the Reign of William III down to the year 1782.

Books:—Millar's View of the English Constitution—The State Trials of the Period—Statute Book—Rapin's History—Hallam's Constitutional History.

EQUITY.

The Reader on Equity proposes to deliver, during the ensuing Educational Term, Twelve Lectures on the following subjects:—

I.—On the Doctrine of Performance and Satisfaction.

II.—On the Implied Substitution of one Gift for another.

III.—On Election.

IV.—On the Jurisdiction exercised by Courts of Equity concurrently with Courts of Law, and on the Amalgamation of Common Law with Equity.

V.—On the Jurisdiction of Equity in Matters of Account.

VI.—On Partnership.

VII.—On Frauds remediable in Courts of Equity.

The Reader will continue with his Senior and Junior Classes the general course of Equity already commenced. He will also continue in the Senior Class, and commence in the Junior, to explain the leading Rules of Pleading in Equity from the work of Lord Redesdale.

Law of Real Property, &c.

The Reader on the Law of Real Property, &c. proposes to deliver, in the ensuing Educational Term, a course of Twelve Public Lectures on the following subjects:—

I.—The Devolution and Transmission of Powers and Trusts for Sale.

II.—The Law of Mortmain.

III.—Attendant Terms; the Satisfied Terms Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 112.

IV.—The Statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106.

V.—The Law of Dower.

VI.—The Apportionment of Rents and Annuities.

In his Private Classes the Reader on Real Property Law will refer more particularly to the Leading Cases cited in the Public Lectures. He will also discuss the Forms of Requisitions to be made on the investigation of Titles shewn upon abstracts delivered by Vendors to Purchasers, and the Nature of the Evidence required by Conveyancers in proof of such Titles.

Jurisprudence and the Civil Law.

The Reader on Jurisprudence and the Civil Law proposes, during the ensuing Educational Term, to deliver Twelve Public Lectures on the following subjects:—

The Sources of Personal Law—The Early History of the Law of Property—The Early History of the Law of Contract, and the Mature Jurisprudence of Rome on the subject of Contract—The Law of Testaments, its Ancient and Modern History—The Roman Law of Civil Process.

The Reader will, with his Private Class, consider the subject of Roman Law in its bearing on Modern Jurisprudence, using as his text-book the Systema Juris Romani Hodie Usitati of Mackeldey, (Leipsig, 1847).

Common Law.

The Reader on Common Law proposes to deliver, during the ensuing Educational Term, Twelve Public Lectures, of which Three (prior to the recess) will be in continuation of the subject treated of in the preceding Course, and the Nine remaining Lectures will be devoted to Criminal Law and matters therewith connected. The programme of the Lectures will be as under:—

Lectures I to III will treat of Mercantile Law generally, Mercantile Persons, and Instruments.

Lecture IV will be introductory to the subject of Criminal Law.

Lectures V to VII will treat of Proceedings at the Police Court or before the Committing Magistrate—Sir J. Jervis's Acts—Superior Courts of Criminal Jurisdiction—The Indictment, its office and nature.

Lecture VIII.—The leading provisions of Lord Campbell's Acts will herein be considered and explained.

Lectures IX to XII will be occupied in analysing and defining offences of ordinary occurrence triable at Quarter Sessions and the Assizes, and in directing attention to the rules of evidence appropriate to their investigation.

With his Class the Reader on Common Law will examine minutely the subjects above specified, illustrating them by reference to the most important recent cases, and to the following works:—Smith's Mercantile Law and Leading Cases; Archbold's Criminal Pleading, by Welsby; Greaves's edition of Lord Campbell's Acts; and Taylor on Evidence, 2nd ed.

By order of the Council,
(Signed) Francis Whitmarsh,
Chairman (pro tem.)

CAUTION.—TO TRADESMEN, MERCHANTS, SHIPPERS, OUTFITTERS, &c.

WHEREAS it has lately come to my knowledge that some unprincipled person or persons have for some time past been imposing upon the public, by selling to the Trade and others a spurious article under the name of BOND'S PERMANENT MARKING INK; this is to give Notice, that I am the original and sole Proprietor and Manufacturer of the said Article, and do not employ any traveller, or authorise any persons to represent themselves as coming from my establishment, for the purpose of selling the said Ink. This Caution is published by me to prevent further imposition upon the public, and serious injury to myself.

E. R. BOND, Sole Executrix and Widow of the late John Bond, 28, Long-lane, West Smithfield, London.

 To avoid disappointment from the substitution of counterfeits, be careful to ask for the genuine Bond's Permanent Marking Ink; and further to distinguish it, observe that NO SIXPENNY SIZE is or has at any time been prepared by him, the Inventor and Proprietor.

 Orders for THE JURIST given to any Newsman, or letter (post-paid) sent to the Office, No. 3, CHANCERY LANE, or to STEVENS & NORTON, 26, BELL YARD, LINCOLN'S INN, will insure its punctual delivery in London, or its being forwarded on the evening of publication, through the medium of the Post Office, to the Country.

Printed by HENRY HANSARD, at his Printing Office, in Parker Street, in the Parish of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, in the County of Middlesex; and Published at No. 3, CHANCERY LANE, in the Parish of St. Dunstan in the West, in the City of London, by HENRY SWEET, residing at No. 34, Porchester Terrace, Bayswater, in the County of Middlesex.—Saturday, April 4, 1857.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, APRIL 11, 1857.

ALTHOUGH, by the dissolution of Parliament, amongst other measures, Lord Brougham's Bill to amend the Law with respect to the Property of Married Women has dropped, yet as it will in all probability be again brought by his Lordship before the Parliament soon about to assemble, we think it right to redeem our promise, made a few numbers back, of noticing the principle of the bill, the provisions by which it is proposed to be carried out, and the probability of its affording a remedy for the defects and injustice of the law as it at present exists. The bill proposes, that in the absence of contract, the real and personal property of a married woman at the time of her marriage, or which should accrue to her during her coverture, including her earnings, and the rents, issues, and profits thereof, should be held by her to her separate use, as if she were a feme sole, and should not be subject to the disposition, control, debts, or engagements of her husband. (Sects. 1, 2).

In respect of such property a married woman is to be liable upon any contracts entered into by her before or during coverture, with full power to give receipts, and she may sue and be sued in her own name alone, as if she were a feme sole, (sect. 3); and decrees, judgments, rules, and orders are to be binding upon her property, as if she were a feme sole. (Sect. 4).

On the other hand, a husband is no longer to be liable in respect of the ante-nuptial debts or contracts of his wife, except to the value or amount of any property of his wife which may have been or be settled upon the husband or the children of the marriage. (Sect. 5).

The property of a married woman is to be liable jointly with her husband's to an execution in any action on their joint contracts, (sect. 6); but a married woman is not to be liable to arrest. (Sect. 7).

A married woman is to have power to dispose of such property during her life or by will, as if she were a feme sole, (sect. 8); but it is to be liable to her debts, contracts, and engagements. (Sect. 9).

In the event of the death of a married woman intestate, the husband is to take the same estate, interest, or distributive share in her real and personal estate as such married woman would have taken had such real or personal estate belonged to her husband, and he had died intestate. (Sect. 10).

Subject thereto, her personal property is to go to her child or children, or if she has none, to the person or persons entitled under the Statutes for the Distribution of Intestates' Estates, as if such married woman had died a feme sole. (Sect. 11).

The act, however, is not to interfere with any settlement, or agreement for a settlement. (Sect. 12).

From this summary of the bill it will be seen that the principle upon which it proceeds is, to give a married woman, in the absence of contract, the same power over her property and earnings as if she were a feme sole; in other words, to put the wife, with respect to her property, and the power of disposing of it, upon a perfect equality with her husband—that is to say, to allow her to enjoy her property in the same mode in which the law now allows him to enjoy his. Whether this be more just, and likely to lead to more beneficial results than the present law, which converts marriage into a species of leonine partnership, in which the husband, retaining his own, absorbs in most cases the whole property of his wife, we will now proceed to examine.

Although Lord Brougham's bill proposes a fundamental alteration in the common law of England, which merges, as it were, the very existence of the wife in that of the husband, rendering her thereby a mere nonentity, it merely adopts principles long acted upon by Courts of equity, which recognise her separate existence, and, where they can, prevent the injustice which the law allows, of the husband taking possession of the property of the wife without insuring her a provision out of it. A Court of equity, however, can only enforce the wife's equity to a settlement out of property coming within its cognisance, and not out of property which can be reached by the husband at law, or which he obtains before proceedings are taken in equity. If, however, the principle upon which equity acts with respect to the wife's equity to a settlement be right, (as it certainly is), it should be applicable to every species of property of the wife, and should not depend upon the mere accident of the property being of a certain nature, or of proceedings having been taken before the husband obtains possession. This Lord Brougham's bill will effect: the wife will in all cases, in the absence of contract, take her own property to her separate use.

A correspondent (ante, p. 68) admits that the proposed alteration would "be well if the law in other respects regarded a married woman as an independent unit." But he adds, "her personal identity is merged in her husband's, and the impossibility of reconciling the possession of property with the condition of a slave has been shewn in the working of the Chancery institution of separate estate. For the evils incident to the separate peculium of married women, the conveyancers, with the sanction of the Chancellors, have contrived a Chancery remedy, in the shape of a restraint on anticipation; but this, at best, is but fetter against fetter, and could not be adapted to such a comprehensive measure as Lord Brougham contemplates."

Again he says—"At present the doctrine of equity gives absolute protection to the reversionary interests of married women in personal property; the husband cannot even beat her out of it."

Now, it is true, that in order to prevent the husband, by his influence, obtaining from his wife the capital of property settled to her separate use, conveyancers have invented, and the Courts of equity sanctioned, the clause which restrains a married woman from aliening the capital or in any way anticipating the income of her separate property. With the law upon this subject, which depends upon contract, Lord Brougham's bill does not meddle; it will remain the same as at present; it deals only with the property of married women not affected by contract, which in nearly all cases now either belongs absolutely to the husband, or may be reduced into possession by him; and the proposed law will, at all events, give the wife the power of saying whether her husband, or her husband's creditors, shall have it or not.

With regard to the objection, that this would be no benefit to the wife—in fact, that she would be either "beaten" or cajoled out of her property by her husband, and that there is an impossibility of reconciling the possession of property with what our correspondent terms the "condition of a slave"—admitting, for the sake of argument, that such is the condition of women in this country, is it not obvious that giving them equal rights of property with their husbands will greatly tend to raise them from that position to be fitting companions to free men, and that in process of time the education of women, in order to fit them for their new rights, will be so much improved that they will be enabled to exercise them in a manner creditable to themselves and beneficial to their families?

With regard to the objection, that under Lord Brougham's bill a married woman will be in a worse position with regard to her reversionary personal property than under the present law, we consider that there is little real weight in it; for although under the proposed law she will have the power of disposition over such property, yet as it is probable that in by far the greater number of cases such power will be exercised for the benefit of herself and her family generally, it will be an improvement upon the present law, which, by an absurd anomaly, prevents married women from dealing with reversionary interests in personalty, while they have full power to do so with reversionary interests in realty.

Another objection was urged to the proposed measure by Lord Campbell in the House of Lords—"it appeared to him to be a very natural question, what was to become of the children of the marriage? Was the wife, for instance, to be committed to prison in case she refused to contribute her proper share to the expense of the ménage?" In answer to the question of the noble Lord, we may observe, that nothing of the kind is proposed, or, as we think, ought to be proposed, to compel the wife to contribute to such expenses, any more than the law now compels the husband to contribute towards them.

According to the present law, however large the income of a husband may be, we are not aware of any law by which his Lordship, as Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, or any judge of the land, can compel a husband either to educate the children of the marriage or maintain a household in a manner suitable to his rank in life or to the amount of his income. So long as he keeps his family from being chargeable upon the parish, the law cannot compel him to aid his wife in maintaining his family by her in a suitable manner, although she alone may be endeavouring to do so either by her own earnings or out of her separate property.

The proportion of a person's income which he chooses to expend for such purposes is left by the law, and as we think wisely, to the discretion of each individual. It is a duty, no doubt, of every person to educate his children and to maintain his household in a manner befitting his station and income, but that duty is one of imperfect obligation, belonging to the domain of morals rather than of law; and as the law does not enforce it in the case of the husband, why should it enforce it in the case of the wife? In our opinion it should be left equally to the discretion of the wife; and experience, we think, will well warrant us in the assertion, that it will in general be found that the natural feelings of a wife and mother would prompt her to do what is right, without vesting in any Court the power of committing her to prison for refusing to contribute her proper share towards the education or maintenance of the children of the marriage, or towards keeping up her household.

The Lord Chancellor, in his Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill, apparently considers that there is no insuperable objection to married women, in certain cases, holding all their property, in the absence of contract, to their separate use; for he proposes, that after a divorce à mensâ et thoro, or a separation of husband and wife by deed inrolled, she should take and dispose of property as a feme sole; and upon her again cohabiting with her husband, "all such property as she may be entitled to when such cohabitation shall take place shall be held to her separate use; and the same shall be settled accordingly, subject, however, to any agreement in writing made between herself and her husband whilst separate." Now, Lord Brougham's bill, as it seems to us, is far preferable, inasmuch as it proposes in all cases, in the absence of contract, to give a married woman the separate use in her own property; whilst the Lord Chancellor makes it a condition precedent to her so enjoying her property that she shall obtain a divorce à mensâ et thoro, or that a deed of separation between husband and wife shall have been duly inrolled.

The proposed law, if it be adopted by our Legislature, will be beneficial rather to the middle and poorer classes than the wealthy; for the latter, by their settlements, make a law for themselves; the former either neglect, or cannot afford, to do so. Above all, it will prevent that scandal to our law, which, in the eloquent language of Lord Brougham, enables a husband, without having "in the least degree helped in their production, and without the delay, the respite of an instant, or one word of notice or warning, or even demand, to seize upon the whole of the earnings of his wife, sweep all away, and leave her, who created the whole, stripped of them to the very last farthing."

The rights of finders of lost property are founded in clear and philosophical principles of jurisprudence. Difficulty is, however, not unfrequently experienced in the practical application of the rules upon this subject, especially when the question arises whether the finder, who has appropriated the goods to his own use, has committed larceny.

Found goods may have been abandoned, lost, or hidden. In each of these cases the rights of the finder will differ.

In the early stages of society the right of property was founded on mere occupancy, which in fact constituted the sole title to it. One who found and took possession of goods, not in the possession of another, became at once the owner by the mere title by occupation. So simple were the ideas of property, that the right apart from the possession was not recognised. In the course of time, however, when the people turned their attention to commerce and a more complete cultivation of the land, these simple and primitive ideas of property of necessity gave way, by common consent, to new and artificial rules, calculated to encourage industry and increase the production of the necessaries and comforts of life, and the title by occupation speedily became extinct, except in the few cases which form the subject of the present article, and which we will now proceed to discuss.

When the owner abandons goods with the intention of entirely relinquishing them, he becomes at once divested of all property therein, and, except in the case of abandonment in favour of particular persons, they become publici juris, and liable to become the property of the first person who takes possession. Where one casts a purse into the highway with the intention of throwing it away, the first who obtains possession becomes the owner, according to the maxim, "Quod ante nullius est, id naturali ratione occupanti conceditur."

When, however, goods have been casually lost by the owner, and there has been no intention on his part of relinquishing them, the property therein does not pass from him, nor can any right as against him be acquired by the finding and taking possession. Moreover, the finder of goods, by taking possession of them, places himself under certain obligations to the owner in respect of them. He is under no obligation to take possession, but if he does he becomes by operation of law a quasi gratuitous bailee of them for the real owner. It probably would not be correct in any sense to say that this obligation arises ex contractu. It may, however, be laid down that a finder taking possession would be placed in the same situation as to his obligation to take care of the property as a gratuitous depository ex contractu. (Isaac v. Clarke, 2 Bulst. 306; Story's Bailm. s. 85). The least degree of care known to the law would, therefore, be all that would be required of him, which would make him liable only for gross negligence or wilful injury.

On the other hand, the finder is not entitled to any recompense or reward from the owner for finding his property, if none has been offered; he is only entitled to be paid for his reasonable and necessary expenses incurred on account of the property restored. Nor has he a lien on the goods for the amount of his claim, as the case does not come within the common-law principle of lien, which includes only the two cases where, first, one is compelled (Skinner v. Upshaw, Raym. 752; Smith v. Dearlove, 6 C. B. 132) to receive the property of another, as is the case with a common carrier or an innkeeper; and, secondly, where one has improved (Franklin v. Hosier, 4 B. & Al. 341) or altered the properties of the article delivered to him. Nor has he a right of lien arising ex contractu, either expressly or founded in usage; and there is no right of lien that is not founded upon one of these grounds. The clause, therefore, so frequently inserted in advertisements, "that found property will be given up upon the payment of the expenses," in so far as it imposes the payment of expenses as a condition precedent to giving it up, is void, the finder having no right to make such a condition; he is bound at once to hand over the property to the owner, and can only enforce his claim, if any, by action.

Mr. Justice Story, in his treatise on Bailments, (p. 391, 2nd ed.), expresses a strong opinion that the finder of goods ought in every case to be entitled to a reward for the mere finding and restoring, in addition to the indemnity for necessary expenses, as in the case of salvage payable to those who rescue goods from the sea. The English law, however, recognises no such right; and there is certainly a wide distinction between the danger and enterprise implied in the rescue of goods from the perils of the sea and the mere finding on land. At the same time, if the owner of lost goods publishes, either through the medium of a newspaper, or by handbills, or by proclamation vivâ voce, that a reward will be paid to any person who will bring him the lost articles, any one complying with the terms of the offer becomes at once entitled to the reward, and may sue for it. The publication of such an offer is evidence of a continuing offer until it is recalled; so that, before such revocation, performance or a readiness and willingness and an offer to perform that which is required by the advertisement completes a valid and binding contract.

A rather curious case arose recently, but which, fortunately for the parties, was settled before they were far advanced in litigation. The loser had offered a reward to any one who would bring the article to his counting-house; the finder on the same day and in the same paper had inserted an advertisement that the owner might have the article upon calling for it and paying for that advertisement. The owner, acting thereupon, called and demanded his property, at the same time paying for the advertisement. The finder, however, having now seen the other advertisement, conceived that he was entitled to the reward. There is, however, no doubt or difficulty in such a case. The advertisement of the owner is evidence of a continuing offer on his part until revoked, and if acted upon by the other before revocation, a complete and binding contract is at once effected. But if the owner is the first to act upon the advertisement of the other, whether by complying with its terms, or by merely taking advantage of the information it contains, and demanding his goods, then ipso facto the offer contained in his advertisement is recalled, and the opportunity of acting upon it gone.

The finder of a chattel casually lost, and not actually abandoned, although he acquires no property therein as against the real owner, has nevertheless such a property as will entitle him to keep it against all the rest of the world, and he may maintain trover against a wrongdoer in respect of it. This was decided in the leading case of Armory v. Delamirie, (1 Str. 504; 1 Smith's L. C. 151). In that case a chimney-sweeper's boy found a jewel, and took it to a goldsmith's to know what it was; the man, under the pretence of weighing it, took out the stones, and then offered the boy three halfpence for it: the boy, however, insisted upon having the jewel returned, whereupon the man gave him back the empty socket. In trover against the goldsmith, the boy recovered the full value of the jewel. It is now established that mere possession is sufficient to entitle one to maintain trover against a wrongdoer, and the latter cannot set up the jus tertii. (Jeffreys v. The Great Western Railway Company, 2 El. & Bl. 802; 2 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 250).

So, again, in the well-known case of Bridges v. Hawksworth, (21 L. J., Q. B., 75), the plaintiff had found a bundle of bank notes, which had been accidentally dropped on the floor of the defendant's shop by some one unknown. The plaintiff handed them to the shopkeeper for the real owner when discovered, and then at once took steps at his own expense to find him out. The owner not appearing after the lapse of a considerable time, the plaintiff demanded the notes, but the shopkeeper refused to give them up, whereupon the action was brought; and it was held that the finder was entitled to recover the notes, for that in the first place, by the finding on the shop floor during the hours that the shop was open to the public, he acquired the same property as if he had found them in the public highway; and, secondly, that the handing them over to the shopkeeper for the purpose and under the circumstances mentioned did not divest him of this right. Where, however, goods are casually dropped in an inn, the landlord, and not the actual finder, is entitled to keep them, for the landlord has a special property in the goods of all persons coming into his inn, and such goods are not therefore strictly lost property. The landlord acquires this right in consequence of the obligation he is under to take them in, and the burthen involuntarily (Calye's case, 8 Rep. 32; 1 Smith's L. C. 47) cast upon him in case of any injury or loss befalling them. In like manner articles left by visitors in a private house do not properly come within the category of lost goods, as they are under the protection and in the quasi possession of the host.

If the owner never appears, the goods belong to the finder. This is the general rule. If the finder, however, knows, or has the means within his reach of finding out the owner, then he will not be justified in appropriating the goods to himself. According to the strict doctrine of Ulpian (Dig. 47) it was theft to convert to one's own use (animo lucrandi) property found, when the finder had not reason to believe it had been abandoned. The doctrine of the English law, however, is not so severe. The rule is, that if the finder of goods, knowing who the owner is, or reasonably believing that he can be found, nevertheless takes them with the intention of appropriating them to his own use, it is larceny. The fundamental rule is, that to constitute the crime of larceny there must be a felonious taking or an actual taking animo furandi; that is to say, a taking of another man's goods into one's possession with intent at that very time to take the entire dominion over them, and to appropriate them to one's own use against the will of the owner. And in 3 Inst. 107, tit. "Larceny," we find it thus laid down by Lord Coke—"Actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea, and the intent to steal must be when it cometh to his hands or possession, for if he hath the possession of it once lawfully, though he hath animum furandi afterward, and carrieth it away, it is no larceny;" and this doctrine, which has been confirmed by numerous decisions, is still the law of England, although some difficulty has been found in the application of it to certain cases. For example, a finder of a bank note kept it in his possession for some time without converting it to his own use; he possessed from the first the means of finding out who the owner was; he subsequently appropriated it to his own use, and was then indicted, and convicted of larceny. Now, in this case, if he had been indicted before the actual conversion of the note, he would have been acquitted, because the conversion was the principal fact which proved that the original taking was felonious; and from this the conclusion has sometimes been erroneously drawn, that the act of conversion constitutes the larceny; this, however, is not so; the act of conversion is merely evidence of the animus of the original taking, and it is simply as evidence of this that it is submitted to the consideration of the jury upon the question, which is always the question to be determined in these cases, did the prisoner, when he found the goods, take them into his possession with the intention of appropriating them to his own use, at the same time knowing, or believing that he had the means of ascertaining, who the owner was? (Reg. v. Preston, 2 C. C. R. 353; 21 L. J., M. C., 41). There is nothing, therefore, in this case inconsistent with the rule laid down by Lord Coke, from which it follows, that if one takes goods into his possession without any felonious intent, and afterwards change his mind and fraudulently convert them, it will not constitute the crime of larceny. For, as observed by Alderson, B., in the last-mentioned case, "how can a subsequent alteration in a man's mind convert an honest taking ex post facto into a dishonest one?"

The same question was again fully discussed in the case of Reg. v. Thurborn, (2 Car. & K. 831), in which the rule was laid down as follows:—"If a man finds goods which have been actually lost, or which are reasonably supposed by him to have been lost, and appropriates them with intent to take the entire dominion over them, really believing when he takes them that the owner cannot be found, it is not larceny; but if he takes them with the like intent, though lost, but believing that the owner can be found, it is larceny." In that case the prisoner found a bank note, and took it, intending to appropriate it to his own use; he did not know who the owner was, and there was evidence to shew that he could have had no reasonable idea that the owner could be found; he kept the note in his possession for some time without converting it; the owner, however, subsequently appeared, when the prisoner immediately converted the note; and in this case, upon the grounds above stated, it was held that there was no larceny. In addition to the difficulty that arose in these cases, there is another class of cases, in which a question arises as to what constitutes the taking within the rule; for example, the prisoner had placed a flock of sheep to pasture with others in a field, and afterwards, in driving them away, he inadvertently drove along with them a sheep belonging to another person; upon his subsequently discovering the strange sheep, although he knew who the owner was, he still kept it, and sold it with his own. In this case it was contended, on behalf of the prisoner, that according to the rule already laid down, as the original taking was not felonious, there was no larceny. It was, however, held otherwise, upon the ground that the taking, strictly speaking, was when the prisoner found the strange sheep in his flock. The cases of money found by tailors and carpenters and others in articles sent to them to be repaired are instances of a like nature. (Cartwright v. Green, 8 Ves. 405). The following also is an example of the same class:—A lady, upon leaving a shop, inadvertently carried away an article hanging to her dress, and, upon subsequently finding it, kept and appropriated it to her own use, instead of returning it. This constituted a larceny, the taking being at the time of finding, and not at the time of leaving the shop.

Where a person purchased a bureau at a public auction, and afterwards discovered, in a secret drawer, a purse of money, and appropriated it, the Court held, that if he had notice that the bureau alone, and not the contents, were sold, or if he had reason to believe so, then his appropriation amounted to larceny. (Merry v. Green, 7 M. & W. 623). In like manner, goods bailed for a special purpose, or for a particular time, may, upon any determination of the bailment, become the subject of larceny, and the taking will be when the bailment is determined; so that a carrier may commit larceny of goods originally taken by him lawfully, or a hirer of a horse by afterwards making away with him. It must be borne in mind, however, that the jury must be satisfied in all cases that there was a taking animo furandi in the strictest sense. If, in the absence of such taking, a finder keep the goods, however improper his object may be, it will not be larceny. Thus it was so decided in a case where the finder merely kept them in the hope of a reward being offered; (Reg. v. Yorke, 2 Car. & K. 841); although it was also decided, that where the original taking was with an intention to appropriate, it was still larceny, notwithstanding the prisoner afterwards gave them up, in order to obtain the reward. (Reg. v. Peters, 1 Car. & K. 245).

We will now concisely enumerate the classes of cases in which the property in found goods does not pass to the finder. In the first place, the rule does not extend to goods found hidden in the earth, usually called "treasure-trove." This, where the true owner cannot be found, belongs to the Crown, or the lord of the manor or other grantee of the Crown. Originally, at common law, according to Lord Coke, treasure-trove belonged to the finder; (3 Inst. 132); and Grotius lays it down that it belongs by the law of nature to the finder. The rule laid down in Justinian is, that treasure shall belong to the finder if he find it in his own land; and if in the land of another, then one-half shall belong to the finder and the other to the owner of the soil. However, in England and the principal European countries, a different rule of law was established in the feudal times, which gave the right to the prince, and not to the finder; and indeed, in those times, the concealment of treasure, when found, was made a highly penal offence. At the present day the rule is certainly not rigidly put in practice against finders.

Secondly, wreck and goods found derelict at sea do not belong to the finder or rescuer, although absolutely abandoned. All wreck not claimed by the owner belongs to the Crown, or the lord of the manor or other grantee of the Crown; and derelicts at sea become the perquisites or droits of the Admiralty, the finder or salvor being entitled to a proportion of the thing saved, by way of remuneration, which is technically called "salvage."

Thirdly, we have the case of goods waived or abandoned by a thief in his flight. These were in ancient times considered to belong to the Crown absolutely, whether the true owner appeared or not, upon the ground of a supposed want of vigilance and activity on his part in not successfully pursuing and capturing the thief. The owner, however, became entitled to them upon his prosecuting the thief. At the present day no such claim of the Crown could be set up successfully against that of the true owner; the Crown, however, is still entitled against the finder, although this right is not in general put in force.

Fourthly is the case of estrays which are valuable, and reclaimed animals found wandering, and no one knows to whom they belong. After being proclaimed in the church and two adjoining market towns, they become, after a year and a day, the property of the Crown, or the lord of the manor or other grantee of the Crown. Animals feræ naturæ, and animals not valuable in the eye of the law, such as dogs and cats, do not come within the category of estrays. The lord, who is entitled to the estray, is bound to feed and take proper care of it, but he must not make use of it until the expiration of the year and a day, unless it is necessary for the animal's well-being—such as exercising a horse or milking a cow.

Lastly, we have those special cases in which by express enactment the common law on the subject has been altered. Thus, by the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 33, (the Metropolitan Hackney Carriages Act), s. 11, all property left in cabs is to be taken by the driver to the nearest police-station, and left there, and the property is to be returned to the owner upon his paying the expenses and a reasonable reward to the cab-driver. If such property is unclaimed for a year it may be sold, and the proceeds, after paying the expenses and a reasonable reward to the cab-driver, be paid into the public treasury. A similar provision is also made in the case of property left in any metropolitan stage-carriage, and a penalty of 10*l.* imposed upon any passenger taking possession of such property, and refusing to hand it over to the conductor or coachman.

It may be here observed that it is not unusual amongst railway companies to make a yearly sale of all the unclaimed articles found in their carriages and at their stations. They have, however, no right so to dispose of the lost property, unless in certain cases special provision is made for this purpose in their special act, or their bye-laws made according to the powers conferred upon them.

Review.

Daniell's Practice of the High Court of Chancery. Third Edition. Adapted to the present Practice of the Court. By Thomas Emerson Headlam, M. P., one of her Majesty's Counsel. 2 vols. 8*vo.*
[Stevens & Norton.]

A book of such long-established and high reputation as Mr. Daniell's, which has long been considered the standard authority on Chancery practice, requires no recommendation from us; and it is needless to observe how desirable a new edition is at the present time. The last preceding edition appeared in 1845, since which time the course of Chancery proceeding has undergone a change, which, though we do not dispute its title to be called a reform, may also lay claim to the appellation of a revolution. The labours of the present editor upon the former edition are so well and so favourably known to the Profession that it is unnecessary to say anything as to his competency for the task, and we hope that the present publication will be valued by them as it deserves. At the same time we feel it our duty to notice, in no unfriendly spirit of criticism, that there are one or two points which, as it seems to us, might be usefully attended to in any future edition. In a work looked upon as the code of Chancery practice the student and practitioner might well expect to find some information as to interpleader suits; but the silence as to them which was observed in the first edition has been continued down to the present time; and a like disappointment awaits any one who turns to the work for any information as to bills to perpetuate testimony. We also cannot but think, that although the rules of the Court as to parties are now considerably relaxed, that subject is somewhat too perfunctorily treated of in the present edition. We do not think that such a summary as this—"The general result of the New Rules is, that technicalities of all kinds are now banished from the subject, and it is only necessary in every suit in equity to make such persons parties as are clearly and obviously, from the nature of the case, necessary, namely, those against whom direct relief is sought"—is calculated to give a student a correct impression, or to serve as a useful guide to the practitioner. We think it necessary also to warn those who use the work for reference that it cannot safely be relied on as containing a complete collection of the cases decided upon the different sections of the Chancery Amendment Act. In the preparation, however, of a work like the present, in which more extensive alterations were required than are usually necessary in a new edition of a standard work, some slips and omissions may well be excused, and the rule applied—"Haud ego paucis offendar maculis."

SIR,—In the notice which you have done me the honour to take of my "Letters to John Bull" you remark, after much that is complimentary, that evidently without having given the matter any deliberate attention, I dispose of the important question of registration by addressing my "gullible" friend in the following style:—"Now, if you are willing to give up settling, and give up leasing, and to go back to a rather primitive state of things, you may, by machinery of registration, in somewhat less than a century's time, make the transfer of landed property wonderfully simple. But if you are not willing to do this, you must patiently submit to bear the expense which the facility and security of disposition you now enjoy inevitably bring."

Now, so far from my having neglected to give the matter any deliberate attention, the next page but one of your own periodical contains evidence to the contrary. You there give some extracts from the report of the commissioners, part of which runs thus:—"One of the witnesses has observed, in his evidence, that 'a map is a good servant, but a bad master—very useful as an auxiliary, but very mischievous if made indispensable.' In this opinion we concur." The witness who so far carried the commissioners with him was no other than myself; and you will find in the appendix to their report upwards of three folio pages occupied by my evidence—a circumstance which at least affords a presumption that I have given the matter some attention. In fact, if there is any matter to which my attention has been deliberately given, this is the one; and the quotation which you have done me the honour to make from my "Letters to John Bull" contains, though in few words, the result of as much deliberate attention as I am able to give.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
7, New-square, Lincoln's-inn, JOSHUA WILLIAMS.
4th April, 1857.

[We still think that we used the right expression in saying that Mr. Williams had not given the matter any deliberate attention. Lord Bacon advises that no one should conclude his adversary's opinion to be wrong until he is able to understand and explain how he fell into the error; and when a self-taught genius tells us that he has squared the circle, or solved the Delian problem, while we give him credit for having sufficiently perspired over his own notions, we are also certain that he has not given any deliberate, that is to say, effective, attention to "the matter," namely, the received science of geometry, which he professes to amend. If he had laid aside his preconceived notions—his prejudices—becoming a student before proceeding master, he would have learned what every patient attentive student does learn. So a plaintiff or defendant, who enters with all the ardour and blindness of a partisan into the intricacies of the evidence and arguments on his own side, does not give any attention to the "question in the cause." And so, as we think, Mr. Williams, though he may have given much attention to certain considerations relating to registration, has not given to the proposed scheme that attention which is expected from every learner, from every candid critic, the attention necessary to understand it thoroughly. If he had done so, we have sufficient confidence in his ability, and in our own candour, to believe that we should have seen in his letter on "the transfer of land" some objections worthy of serious attention. In this he is not singular. We have conversed with several learned conveyancers who had published objections to the plan known as Mr. Wilson's, and not one of them was able to stand the mildest examination in "Wilson's plan." They had never read it through—did not understand it; and their conduct in the matter has hardly been burlesqued by the pamphlet published two months ago under the title of "A few words of explanation and advice to landowners on the Bill about to be introduced into Parliament for the Registration of Land, by a Conveyancing Barrister," in which the writer, after arguing strenuously against the bill, winds up with the confession, that he is "not aware what may be the scheme of the bill to be introduced into Parliament."

We are justified in concluding from the evidence before us, that Mr. Williams has not "got up" Mr. Wilson's plan as he ought to have done before he condemned it. If he had got it up, his objections and arguments against it would have been more definite than the following, which comprise (in our words, not those of Mr. Williams) the entire substance (in argument and suggestion) of his letter to J. B.:—"You cannot have the services of talented men without paying for them. You cannot mortgage, charge, settle, and will property, as you now do, without considerable expense. A settlement should provide, and does provide, for the most remote contingencies, and must be skilfully drawn. According to the present practice, land cannot be sold without an expensive investigation of the history of the ownership. You cannot avoid this without giving up the use of settlements. [Mr. Williams suggests this inference, but omits to prove it.] By the new plan it is proposed to place land on the same footing as stock; but an acre of land has individuality—100*l.* of stock has none. You must measure and describe land. This requires skill and labour, to be paid for. Then, stock is not subject to leases and underleases, as land is; and it is not liable, while in settlement, to an overgrowth of mortgages and leases, as land is. Therefore the proposed plan cannot be adopted without giving up leases, settlements, and mortgages, and going back to a rather primitive state of things." This is all. We repeat that evidently Mr. Williams has not given any deliberate attention to Mr. Wilson's plan: he has not got it up half so well as we have got up Mr. Williams's seventh letter. We are sorry for it; for if he would only take the trouble to study it, we believe he would become a convert, and an able and zealous advocate for it.—ED.]

LONDON, APRIL 18, 1857.

In the present article we invite the attention of our readers to a consideration of some of the principal cases that have happened of late years, wherein the validity of appointments, under powers to appoint to or amongst children, has been brought into question. The doctrine which concerns this branch of the subject of powers is one the principles of which have been very clearly defined; but in practice the application of those principles is often a task of considerable difficulty, and requires a very nice and delicate discrimination.

The fundamental principle by which the validity of all appointments is to be tested was laid down long ago by Lord Keeper Henley in these terms, namely, "that a person having a power must execute it bonâ fide for the end designed, otherwise it is corrupt and void;" (Aleyn v. Belchier, 1 Eden, 138); and an appointment not so executed, although correct in form, and unimpeachable at law, will be set aside in equity as a fraud upon the power. It has also been long since established, that with respect to powers of appointment amongst children, whether they be powers of selection or of distribution only, an appointment, if fraudulent in part, will be set aside altogether, "except where some consideration has been given that cannot be restored, and it has consequently become impossible to rescind the transaction in toto, and to replace the parties in the same situation;" (per Sir W. Grant in Daubeny v. Cockburn, 1 Mer. 643); although, as to powers of jointuring, a contrary doctrine has been maintained, and there the appointment will only be rescinded to the extent in which it is affected by the fraud. (2 Sugd. Pow. 189). It is equally notorious, that where a power has been excessively executed, but without fraud, and with an honest intention in favour of the objects of the power, the appointment may be partially supported, even in the case of powers to appoint amongst children, and the excess alone will be void. What circumstances, however, will be sufficient to stamp an appointment to a child or children with the badge of fraud, and in what cases such an appointment can be considered as having been intended for the benefit of the objects and to promote the ends, although it exceeds the limits, of the power, it is not quite so easy to decide. On these points the recent cases shed considerable light.

One of the plainest instances of a fraudulent execution is that where a parent, having either an exclusive or merely a distributive power, makes an appointment to some or one of his children, which is preceded by or accompanied with a stipulation or arrangement with the appointees for his own benefit; as in Jackson v. Jackson, (1 Dru. 91; S. C., 7 Cl. & Fin. 977), where a portion of the money realised by a lease of the lands appointed was, in pursuance of such an arrangement, applied in payment of debts affecting the estate of the father; and in such a case, according to the rule above stated, it is of course sufficient, in order to vitiate the appointment, that it should have been partially, though not wholly, for the parent's advantage. Upon this point the case of Askham v. Barker (17 Beav. 37) may also be referred to, where, under an exclusive power, an appointment of a fund to grown-up daughters in exclusion of a son, accompanied with an exchange of the sum appointed for an equity of redemption of equal value in real property of the parent, was maintained. Again: an appointment may be bad for fraud, although there is no actual bargain or agreement for the benefit of the parent, but the circumstances attending the execution are such as to shew conclusively, that the design of the appointor was to promote his own interests to the prejudice of the children the objects of the power. Thus, in Wellesley v. Lord Mornington, (2 Kay & J. 143), real estate was limited to trustees for a term of years, to commence from the decease of the survivor of A. and his wife, upon trust to raise portions for A.'s younger children, either after the decease of the survivor of A. and his wife, or in the lifetime of the survivor with his consent; that sum to be divided amongst the children in such shares, and to be a vested interest in them respectively at such ages, &c., as A., in the event, which happened, of his surviving his wife, should appoint; and in default of appointment, to be divided among them equally, to be an interest vested in sons at twenty-one, in daughters at twenty-one or marriage. A. had two younger children, B. and C.; and after the decease of his wife he first made a good appointment of a portion of the sum to B., and then, some years having elapsed, he executed two deeds, whereby he appointed the residue in the proportion of three-fourths, amounting to 27,000*l.*, to B., and the remaining fourth to C., and directed that such sums respectively should be interests vested in and assignable by them immediately upon the execution of the deeds, and should be raised forthwith. At the time of this appointment, the professed object of which was to enable B. to pay his debts, and to make a provision for him, B. was indebted to the amount of about 3000*l.*, but had not been molested by any of his creditors, and was possessed of a small annuity. He was also upwards of thirty years of age, but was in such a state of ill health that his life was despaired of, and this fact was known to A. at that time. Within a year afterwards B. died intestate and unmarried, and letters of administration were granted to A. Under these circumstances C. filed a bill, praying that both the deeds might be set aside as a fraud upon the power; and the Court decreed accordingly, on the ground that A. had executed them with the view of succeeding to the property of his son, who was at that time incapable of making a will. The last case was one of a power to raise portions; but, had the power been to appoint a fund actually in existence, the decision would have been the same, inasmuch as it was founded upon the fact, that the power was executed for the express purpose of enabling the father to reap a profit, which was not the intention of the instrument creating it. There is, however, a slight, yet material, distinction between powers to appoint portions to be raised for the children, and powers to appoint to children a fund actually set apart. For under a power of the former class, an appointment, whereby a portion is raised for a child before it is wanted, carries with itself the evidence of fraud, even though the terms of the power authorise the parent to raise the portion whenever he thinks proper; whereas, under one of the latter class, shares may be appointed to the children long before they are actually required, and yet it may happen that the appointment is not even liable to suspicion on that account. In Butcher v. Jackson (14 Sim. 444) there was a bequest of personalty in trust for A. for life, and after his decease for all or any one or more of the children or other issue of A., in such manner and form, and, if more than one, in such shares and proportions, and the shares of the appointees to vest at such age or ages, as A. should appoint; and in default of appointment, for all the children equally, as tenants in common, to vest in them respectively on their attaining their respective ages of twenty-one years, or deaths under that age leaving issue surviving, with remainder over, contingent upon there being no child of A. who should live to acquire a vested interest under the limitation to the children in default of appointment. Four days after the birth of his first child, A., by deed, appointed the fund to all or any one or more of his children, &c. as he should appoint; and in default of appointment, to or in trust for his son then born, and all and every his children by his present or any after-taken wife, as joint tenants. The effect of this appointment might have been, that A., upon the happening of certain events, would himself take the whole fund, to the exclusion of the persons to whom the contingent remainder was limited. But it appeared that the child was in a good state of health at the time of the appointment; and there was nothing beyond the very tender age of the infant, and the probable exclusion of the parties interested in remainder in the event of there being no issue who could take any benefit under the limitation in default of appointment, from which it could be inferred that the appointment was not made bonâ fide in favour of the objects the power. Under these circumstances the appointment was upheld. Much the same question as was here involved arose in the cases of Fearon v. Desbrisay (14 Beav. 635) and Beere v. Hoffmeister, (3 Jur., N.S., part 1, p. 78). In Fearon v. Desbrisay, by marriage settlement a fund was vested in trustees, in trust for A. for life, and after his decease, subject to an annuity to his wife for her life, for A.'s children by any marriage, at such ages and in such manner and in such shares as A. should appoint; and in default of appointment, upon trust for the children equally, but their shares not to vest until twenty-one, or marriage with consent, with a gift over if there should be no child entitled under the trusts or power. Upon the birth of a son, A. executed the power by giving the whole to his son; but afterwards, upon an expected addition to his family, he, being in a precarious state of health, made a new appointment in favour of all his children equally who should be living at his death. Shortly afterwards A. died; another child, a daughter, was born, and then the son died; and his mother, who had married the plaintiff Fearon, obtained letters of administration to him. Mr. and Mrs. Fearon instituted the suit to recover the share of the son in the trust funds. The parties interested in remainder, contingent upon there being no child who should take under the trusts or power, insisted, that if the daughter should die under twenty-one unmarried, or married without consent, they would become entitled to the whole. The Master of the Rolls nevertheless maintained the appointment, on the ground that the appointor could gain no personal advantage by the mode in which he had executed the power, inasmuch as the persons in whose favour the appointment was to take effect could not be ascertained, till his own death; and that in the case of powers to divide funds already provided it was not necessarily a mark of fraud to appoint shares so as to vest before they were required. His Honor further held, that an appointment was not vitiated merely because the effect of it, if the objects of the power should fail, might be to disappoint those to whom the property was to go in default of appointment. He also said that the validity of the execution of a power could not depend on this, whether the appointee died immediately after or not. The subsequent events which might occur could not make it good in one event, and bad in another; and although in this case it was probably not the intention of the framers of the settlement that the widow of the donee should take any interest beyond her annuity, nor the intention of the donee of the power that she should take any interest in the fund which he gave to his children equally, yet that did not affect the question, because she took, not under the appointment, but by devolution, as representing her child. In Beere v. Hoffmister there was a bequest of personalty, upon trust, after the decease of husband and wife, for all or such one or more of their children, and at such ages, as they should by deed, with or without power of revocation, jointly appoint; and in default, upon trust for the children to be vested interests at twenty-one; with a gift over to the next of kin of the wife, in default of children who should acquire a vested interest. Under this power, an appointment by husband and wife (but reserving a power of revocation and new appointment) of the whole fund in favour of an only child four years of age, but in robust health, the interest to be vested and transmissible immediately after the execution of the deed, was held to be a good execution of the power; although the effect of it, in the events that happened, was to give a benefit to the husband, to the exclusion of the next of kin. The husband at the time of the appointment was in slightly embarrassed circumstances; and the Master of the Rolls said, that if the appointment had been so executed as to have made the appointed fund available as security for advances made to him, and he had obtained advances upon this security, the case would have been different. The three last cases shew, not only that an appointment to a child of tender age, where the estate or fund has been previously set apart or raised for the purpose, is in itself no sign of fraud, but also that the intention of the donor of a power is not to be ascertained merely from the manner in which the fund is given over in default of appointment; and that, if a power is in other respects well executed, the fact that it is executed with the object of providing that in any event the persons entitled in remainder on failure of children shall not take the estate or fund, is not a ground for avoiding the appointment. It has also been decided, that circumstances which raise a strong suspicion, but do not amount to positive proof, that an appointment by a parent to a child was intended for the benefit of the parent, are not sufficient to avoid the appointment. (Hamilton v. Kirwan, 2 Jo. & Lat. 393). At the same time the suspicion, which the attendant circumstances attach to a transaction of this nature, may have such weight with a Court of equity, that, although in the estimation of the judge the appointment is not necessarily bad, he may still think it necessary to call in the assistance of a jury to decide upon its validity. In Gee v. Gurney, (2 Coll. 486; S. C., 10 Jur., part 1, p. 367), before Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, V. C., there was a bequest of personalty, upon trust to invest, and to permit A., a feme sole, to receive the dividends during her life, and after her decease to assign the principal unto and amongst all and every or such one or more of her children, and at such ages, &c., as A. should, notwithstanding coverture, by deed, to be sealed and delivered in the presence of and attested by two or more credible witnesses, or by will, appoint; and subject thereto, among the children in equal shares, who were, if sons, to take vested interests at twenty-one, or if daughters, at that age or marriage; but the will contained no clause for the maintenance of the children until their interests should vest. After the death of the testatrix A. married the plaintiff Gee. In the year following the marriage, a son, the only issue, was born; and within little more than a month after his birth Mrs. Gee executed a deed, reciting her power, whereby she appointed the whole fund, to the dividends of which she was entitled during her life, to the sole use and benefit of her son, and reserved to herself a power of revocation. The son died when five months old, and twenty-four years afterwards Mrs. Gee died without having revoked. The plaintiff having, as he alleged, entirely forgotten the appointment, was reminded of it by finding the deed among his wife's papers at the time of her death, and thereupon obtained letters of administration of the effects of his deceased child, and instituted this suit to compel a transfer of the appointed fund to himself. It appeared that the attesting witnesses to the deed were the plaintiff and one B., who was since dead, and that the deed had not been stamped until shortly previous to the filing of the bill, and with that purpose in view. There was no evidence, besides that of the plaintiff and what appeared on the face of the deed, to shew when it was executed. The Vice-Chancellor thought himself compelled by the above state of facts to direct certain issues, not only to try whether the requisites as to the execution and attestation of the instrument had been properly complied with, but also whether the deed had been fairly obtained from Mrs. Gee, and whether it had been executed by her with a fraudulent intention.

We shall continue this subject in our next number.

GUARDIANSHIP IN CHANCERY.

SIR,—Your correspondent "W." (ante, p. 116) is right in supposing that the statement of "The Protestant Alliance," that the decision of Sir R. T. Kindersley, V. C., in Re Race, proceeded on the ground that the mother was not a fit character to be intrusted with the child, is untrue.

As your correspondent "W." points out, (and it must, indeed, be obvious to every lawyer), this could not have been the ground of a decision that the child must be brought up a Protestant, and that Protestant guardians must be appointed. Moreover, I stated as a fact, of which I am cognisant as counsel in the case, and though not myself counsel in Chancery, I stated it ex relatione of those who were, that the affidavits impeaching the character of the mother were taken off the file; so it is impossible that this could have been the ratio decidendi.

Your other correspondent, "H.," who was counsel in Chancery on the part of the petitioners against the mother, (ante, p. 92), truly stated that the decision went upon the ground that the father was a Protestant, and that the child had been brought up a Protestant until the present time.

Yours &c.,
THE WRITER OF THE FORMER ARTICLES.

Review.

The English Constitution in the Reign of King Charles the Second. By ANDREW AMOS, Esq., Downing Professor of Law in the University of Cambridge, and late Member of the Supreme Council of India.
[Stevens & Norton, 1857.]

THE reign of Charles the Second is a period more important to the student of constitutional law than agreeable to the general reader of history. For the diminished influence of England in her relations with foreign states, compared to the high rank which during the Commonwealth she had held amongst the nations of Europe, the tarnished lustre of her arms abroad and the shameful misgovernment at home, the mean and degraded character of the King, and the immorality which, from the contagion of the court, was spread amongst the people, the venality of the Parliament, and the universal intolerance of all classes—these must excite in every generous mind a feeling of disgust and indignation. Undoubtedly it is some satisfaction to reflect, that the rights and liberties which had been won at the cost of so much bloodshed and misery were only in abeyance, and not altogether lost to us; but even that was owing, not so much to any lofty spirit or clear judgment of affairs in our statesmen or legislators, as to a kind of jealous instinct in the House of Commons, keenly sensible of the value of its privileges, and sharpened by religious animosity. Nor is the unpleasant feeling which we experience while perusing the annals of this period much mitigated by a contemplation of the few bright examples of honour and patriotism there to be met with; for no sooner do we become interested in the views and conduct of these illustrious men, and begin fully to appreciate their virtues, than we are overwhelmed with horror at the cruel injustice with which they were persecuted, or at their untimely and disastrous fate. But, on the other hand, that reign was rich in constitutional legislation. Witness, as loyal zeal, or self-interest or the fear of oppression, alternately held sway, on the one hand, the statutes relating to treason and sedition, the Act of Uniformity, the Corporation Act, the Five Mile Act, and a number of others extremely objectionable, and, for the most part, now happily swept away; on the other hand, the abolition of military tenures, with their vexatious appendages, and of the writ de heretico comburendo, the Test Act, which was levelled against the Duke of York and the Papists, and though it excluded the dissenters from office, was nevertheless strenuously promoted by them, both upon religious and political grounds, and the famous Habeas Corpus Act, with its truly practical provisions for the security of our persons from unlawful duress. That reign was, moreover, as Mr. Hallam expresses it, "the transitional state between the ancient and modern schemes of the English constitution," and thus presents a sort of stage for the historical commentator, from which he may survey the result of past efforts and experience, and consider what still remained to be done for the protection and adornment of that edifice, of which the columns were already reared and the walls stood, though the buttresses and bulwarks were as yet too weak to secure it against the shocks of the tempest, the carving too rough and unpolished to satisfy the admiring eye. Mr. Amos has placed himself in that situation, and in the book before us has given an accurate picture of the English constitution as it was by law established in the time of the second Charles, and has pointed out how far the political regimen then actually enforced corresponds with that representation. He starts by undertaking to refute some remarks of Blackstone, Fox, and other writers, which point to the theoretical perfection of the constitution at that era, and in the execution of that undertaking he treats us to a lively and amusing, but at the same time instructive, commentary upon the laws and customs, by which the royal prerogative, the Parliament, the Church, liberty of conscience, of the person, of property, and of the press, and of procedure in prosecutions for state offences, were then respectively regulated. He shews, as he proceeds, that some measures enacted in those times were, in truth, the handiwork of other architects than those to whom the merit has commonly been ascribed, or the result of previous events beyond their power to alter or control; and that others, which have been frequently lauded by historians as wise and prudent, have lately come to be regarded as mischievous, and have either been materially varied or in some cases entirely overthrown. The book exhibits abundant evidence of that legal knowledge and careful research for which Mr. Amos is distinguished, and by the pleasant vein of humour which runs throughout its pages, the anecdotes with which it is sprinkled, and the apt quotations with which it is embellished, enables us with the more ease to fix in our memory the important facts so happily illustrated, and affords a seasonable relief after the elaborate panegyric of Sir William Blackstone, and the learned dissertation upon that portion of our constitutional history by Mr. Hallam, who, though graver and more profound, is perhaps less suggestive than our author, and certainly less entertaining. Occasionally, too, Mr. Amos supplies a useful addition or correction to the statements of those writers. In this respect we may notice his interesting remarks upon the press, and the restrictions with which it was shackled, both by statute and by the common law—a subject upon which Mr. Hallam is rather concise. He also cites instances in disproof of Mr. Hallam's assertion, that after the Restoration there was "an entire cessation of impositions of money without the consent of Parliament;" and he largely increases the list of arbitrary proclamations issued by Charles II which that au or furnishes, by a variety of curious examples, including, amongst others, proclamations for pressing soldiers and for martial law, against printers after the expiration of the licensing act, against persons presuming to speak undutifully of his Majesty's measures, and even against those who heard such discourses unless they gave information in due time of offenders, against petitions for the sitting of Parliament, and against importing or vending any painted earthenware except that of china. He has, however, himself fallen into an error, where he indulges in a sarcastic reflection upon the King for his alleged refusal to consent to a bill, which had passed through both Houses of Parliament, for the restoration of the forfeited estate of the Earl of Derby, who was beheaded at Bolton in 1652. Mr. Hallam, in a note, (2 Const. Hist. 23), has given the true version of this story. There are some few points upon which we wish that the learned professor had dwelt a little more fully, or had expressed a more decided opinion. Upon the question, not yet perhaps finally determined, concerning the right of the House of Lords to make alterations in money bills, he is very curt, though he appears to agree with Mr. Hallam, who has inquired into it at length, and considers the advantage of argument to rest with the Peers. And though perhaps it would have been out of place to go deeply into the matter, we should not have been sorry to learn Mr. Amos's opinion with respect to the system of removal under the law of settlement, seeing that, as he tells us, that system occupies so much attention at the present day. Our limited compass will not permit us to follow the author of this work into a multitude of other important topics which it opens for discussion. We are not, however, inclined to concur in his strictures upon the flexibility of the common law, especially at the present time, when precedents are more scrupulously adhered to than at former periods; but we agree with him that it would be both possible and expedient to consolidate "all extant provisions touching illegal imprisonments;" and we would equally encourage any endeavour to methodise "rambling enactments" upon many other branches of law. We do not, however, think him quite correct when he says that by the Nullum Tempus Act of George III, "Time has permanently resumed his hour-glass, and without distinction of persons." For although, by that act, (9 Geo. 3, c. 16), in suits relating to landed estate, sixty years' possession is a bar even against the prerogative, yet, as our readers are aware, there are still many civil claims of the Crown to which a similar limitation might with advantage be prescribed.

The whole of the volume before us is well worthy of a diligent perusal, though, if we were asked to point out any one part of it which is more interesting than another, we should select the last chapter, which relates to the mode of procedure in prosecutions for State offences, and which may be read as a useful appendix to Mr. Phillips's State Trials. Here, too, the author treads upon familiar ground, and consequently assumes a bolder tone of criticism. He expresses an unqualified disapproval of the rule exempting prisoners from interrogation, and still more of that in virtue of which they are cautioned against speaking to their own detection; and criticises, with much freedom and acumen, that law of evidence which, when a man is indicted for an offence involving a charge of conspiracy, admits preliminary proof of the existence of a general plot, before shewing that the prisoner is in any way connected therewith. The account of the writ of habeas corpus, in the chapter upon liberty of the person, will also be found highly valuable to the lawyer; nor can we forbear directing the particular attention of our readers to a speech, quoted in p. 162, which was delivered by the Duke of Buckingham in Parliament in the year 1675, when moving for leave to bring in a bill for the indulgence of Protestant dissenters, and which couches, in plain yet most forcible language, sentiments so noble and so just, that they must excite the admiration of every advocate of religious liberty. In conclusion, we subjoin one passage from Mr. Amos's work as illustrative of his style and purpose, and as not inappropriate to the time of a general election:—

"Members of the House of Commons cannot now be sheltered from the indignation of their constituents during the life of a Sovereign; nor can the kingdom be kept without a Parliament, or a Parliament be prorogued for three years less a day, or be adjourned by royal mandate—all of them constitutional in the reign of Charles II. These improvements of the constitution have been effected as well by means of the Triennial Act of William and Mary, and the Septennial Act of George I, as by a more liberal doctrine concerning adjournments, by a strict and uniform appropriation of supplies, and, more than all, since 1689, by the necessity for an annual Mutiny Act. The annual Mutiny Acts arose out of the occasion for a standing army to preserve the safety and honour of the country, combined with that provision against a standing army, without consent of Parliament, in the Bill of Rights, and that against martial law in the Petition of Right. These two constitutional bulwarks of our ancestors are thus annually reproclaimed, and dispensed with, subject to revival at the end of a year. The necessity for the annual holding of Parliaments consequent on the Mutiny Acts affords a striking example how little to the wisdom of senates, and how much to the concatenation of circumstances beyond human foresight, is to be ascribed the amelioration of the English constitution from its state of imperfection in the reign of Charles II."

WHEREAS it has lately come to my knowledge that some unprincipled person or persons have for some time past been imposing upon the public, by selling to the Trade and others a spurious article under the name of BOND'S PERMANENT MARKING INK; this is to give Notice, that I am the original and sole Proprietor and Manufacturer of the said Article, and do not employ any traveller, or authorise any persons to represent themselves as coming from my establishment, for the purpose of selling the said Ink. This Caution is published by me to prevent further imposition upon the public, and serious injury to myself.

E. R. BOND, Sole Executrix and Widow of the late John Bond, 28, Long-lane, West Smithfield, London.

⁂ To avoid disappointment from the substitution of counterfeits, be careful to ask for the genuine Bond's Permanent Marking Ink; and further to distinguish it, observe that NO SIXPENNY SIZE is or has at any time been prepared by him, the Inventor and Proprietor.

⁂ Orders for THE JURIST given to any Newsman, or letter (post-paid) sent to the Office, No. 3, CHANCERY LANE, or to STEVENS & NORTON, 26, BELL YARD, LINCOLN'S INN, will insure its punctual delivery in London, or its being forwarded on the evening of publication, through the medium of the Post Office, to the Country.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, APRIL 25, 1857.

WE next come more particularly to consider the distinction between a fraudulent execution of a power to appoint amongst children, and an appointment which will be only partially avoided, the scope of the authority having been exceeded through ignorance or misapprehension, but unmixed with any fraudulent design. In Agassiz v. Squire (18 Beav. 431; S. C., 1 Jur., N.S., part 1, p. 50) the Master of the Rolls stated the general maxim in language more full, but very similar to that employed by Lord Keeper Henley. "If," he said, "the Court sees that the real object of the execution by the donee is to do something which was never contemplated by the donor at all, which in point of fact is excluded by him—if that is the object of the exercise of the power, I think it is a fraud on the power, and void. If there is a desire bonâ fide to execute in favour of the objects of the power, and in so doing the donee goes beyond it, then the power itself may be supported, and it will only be void for the excess." But at the same time his Honor professed himself unable to discover a frame of expression that in every instance would clearly point out by which of the two rules the decision should be governed. In that case of Agassiz v. Squire, under an exclusive power to a wife to appoint amongst her sons and her sons' sons by a former marriage, an appointment by her, which exceeded the scope of her authority, by giving a benefit to a daughter, was annulled in toto, not on that account, but because the appointment was also tainted by a bargain for the advantage of the second husband of the donee of the power. The excessive execution in favour of the daughter might alone have been held void had that been the single objection to the appointment; but the fraudulent intention of securing a benefit to the husband, who by the instrument creating the power was excluded from being an appointee, vitiated the whole transaction. The case was well distinguished by the Master of the Rolls from that of "a common execution of a power in favour of persons not the objects of it—such as a power in favour of children, where, in addition to children, the power may have been executed in favour of some grandchildren as appointees, in addition to, or in the place of, their parents deceased." An example of the latter kind is afforded by the case of In re Lord Sondes's Will, (2 Sm. & G. 417), where an appointment of an absolute interest to an object of the power, which, if standing alone, would have been valid, was coupled with additional words, by which, in excess of the power, the children of that object were also made appointees; and it was held that the additional words were to be rejected as nugatory, and that the absolute interest vested in the first appointee. An appointment to a child or children, with a condition annexed not authorised by the terms of the power, is attended with much the same consequences as an excessive execution of the ordinary kind—that is, the condition, which is in excess of the power, will be considered altogether inoperative. (Watt v. Creyke, 3 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 56). But this rule seems to proceed rather upon the principles which relate to estates upon condition subsequent, and also perhaps upon the ground that there is no difficulty in separating the valid from the invalid part of the appointment, than upon any presumption, arising from the form of the executing instrument, that the real aim of the donee was to effectuate the intention of the donor of the power. For if the parent annex to the appointment a condition for his own benefit, yet the appointment may be maintained intact, and unfettered by the restriction which the condition imposes; although, as we have seen, the exercise of the power upon a bargain or secret understanding with the child, whereby a profit to the parent out of the estate or fund appointed is made the consideration of the appointment, is regarded as a fraud upon the power, and wholly avoided accordingly. If, however, where there is a power of selection, the condition is to take effect in favour of other objects of the power, so that the result of the whole instrument amounts to a limitation to one object, with a gift over to another object or other objects, if certain acts be not done—as a limitation to a daughter, provided she makes a payment out of the fund appointed, or assigns her interest in another fund to her brothers, and if she does not make this payment or assignment, then a gift over of the fund to her brothers, to whom it might have been appointed in the first instance—such a condition is good, as being within the scope of the power. (Stroud v. Norman, 1 Kay, 313; S. C., 18 Jur., part 1, p. 264). There is one rather perplexing case, that of Jebb v. Jugwell, (1 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 460), in which it is a little difficult to pronounce whether the power was merely excessively executed, or whether the whole appointment ought to have been set aside for fraud. In that case A. by his will gave all his real and personal estate to his wife during her life; and after her decease, to his daughters, in such proportions as his wife by any legal instrument might direct; and in default of appointment, to be equally divided between them; and he further declared his will to be, that the fortune of each of his daughters should go to her children after her decease, in such proportions as she might direct; but if no appointment, to be equally divided between them. A. died, leaving his widow and his two daughters B. and C., who were both married, surviving. Shortly after A.'s death, his widow, by deed-poll, purporting to be in exercise of her power, appointed one moiety of the property after her decease to such uses as B., notwithstanding coverture, should appoint, and in default of appointment, to B. absolutely; and the other moiety to C. in like manner; and directed that the appointment should take effect immediately. On the following day the daughters and their husbands executed an indenture, whereby the former, in pursuance of the authority supposed to be created by the widow's deed-poll, settled their respective moieties upon similar trusts for the benefit of themselves, their husbands, and children, with mutual limitations of the estates in favour of each daughter and her family in the event of the other dying without issue. There could not be much doubt that this settlement was void, so far as it delayed the interests of the daughters' children, which the terms of the will clearly put out of the power both of the widow and her daughters to affect otherwise than by apportionment of the shares. The settlement, however, expressed the intention of B. and C. and their husbands, that, notwithstanding it might in some measure be defeated by the children, it should in all other respects be carried into effect. The Master of the Rolls nevertheless held the settlement to be altogether void, inasmuch as it was founded upon an authority which the power given by the testator to his widow did not enable her to create. His Honor held that the object of the instrument containing that power was to make a provision for A.'s daughters, in such shares as his widow might think fit to appoint, but by no means to dispense with the protection which the law affords to married women, by the restraints it imposes upon the alienation of their reversionary property during coverture; whereas, on the other hand, the real object of the appointment by the widow was to enable the daughters during coverture to dispose of their reversionary interests, and so to overcome the disabilities which the testator intended should attach to his gift. He concluded, therefore, that the deed-poll was either wholly inoperative, or that it was good only so far as it divided the property of the testator equally between his two daughters. In the result, in this particular instance, it made no difference which of these two alternatives was adopted; but, upon principle, we think that it should have been held that the appointment was wholly void, and that the property went as in default, since the execution of the power was decided to have been at variance with the whole scope of the instrument creating it, and a direct attempt to elude the intention of the donor. As observed by the Master of the Rolls, the appointment was vicious in principle, and in the object sought to be attained; and therefore, although it might have been difficult to say that the donee knew she was not exercising her power for the benefit of her children, she can hardly be supposed to have thought she was exercising it for their benefit in accordance with the object of the donor. In the above case one of the daughters, B., had no children, and it was held, that according to the true construction of the will, B., after the widow's decease, and in default of appointment by her, was entitled to one moiety of the testator's property absolutely. With respect to B.'s moiety, the effect of the appointment and settlement together would have been to give a life interest to B., with divers remainders over in favour of B.'s husband and her sister's family; and in support of the validity of the transaction the case of Phipson v. Turner (9 Sim. 227; S. C., 2 Jur. 414) was cited, where, under an exclusive power, the fund was appointed to one of the children, a married daughter, for life, for her separate use; and after her decease, as she should by will appoint; and in default of appointment, and if she left no issue, unto two sons, who were also objects of the power; and this appointment was held valid. This case of Phipson v. Turner is merely an example of the proposition, that a power to appoint in such proportions as a party pleases authorises the donee to create various estates under it, and to give qualified interests; and in Jebb v. Jugwell the Master of the Rolls said, that if the sole object of the deed-poll had been to ascertain the shares in which the daughters were to take, and not to enable them to dispose of their reversionary interests, the widow might, in accordance with the decision in Phipson v. Turner, have given qualified interests in the property to her daughters, provided she parcelled out the whole between them. It would seem, therefore, that with respect to B.'s share, if the will had left the daughters unrestrained as to the disposition of this property before they came into possession, the settlement would have been good also; because it is established, that in the absence of fraud, an appointment to a child, and then, as part of the same transaction, a settlement by the child upon other persons not objects of the power, or an appointment at once to persons not objects of the power, with the approbation of the child, who is the real object, (which is looked upon in the same light as an appointment to the object, and then a settlement by the object), may be valid. Thus, if B. had been a son, and the widow had appointed one moiety of the property as B. should appoint, and B. had settled the property upon his wife and children, or his sister's children, the transaction would have been unimpeachable; and it is to be observed, that this rule prevails even where the power is not exclusive, but merely authorises an apportionment of the shares. But all such cases will be closely watched, and if there are any circumstances which shew a design to neglect the benefit of the objects of the power, or in any way to defeat the intention of the donor, or if there was not an express and voluntary consent to the settlement on the part of the child, the appointment will be void. A question of this nature arose in the case of Salmon v. Gibbes, (3 De G. & S. 343; S. C., 13 Jur., part 1, p. 355). There a fund was bequeathed in trust for A. for life; and after A.'s decease, for all and every the children of A., at such ages or times, and in such proportions, as A. should by deed or will appoint; and in default of appointment, to be divided equally between them. A., having two daughters, her only children—B., a spinster, and C., a married woman—appointed by deed twenty-four twenty-fifths of the fund, subject to her own life interest therein, to B. absolutely. On the following day, B., in pursuance of a promise previously given to her mother to make a provision for C. and her children, executed a settlement, whereby she assigned one-half of the whole fund upon trust for C. for her separate use during her life; and after C.'s death, to be divided equally between her children. It was proved in the cause, that C. never knew of the settlement until several years afterwards, when she was induced to execute a deed of appointment of a new trustee of the settlement, upon being informed, as was the fact, that the original appointment and settlement had been executed with a view of excluding her husband from all benefit. Upon a bill filed by the husband the Vice-Chancellor set aside the whole transaction as a fraud upon the power. The judgment is rather meagre, but his Honor's decision appears to have proceeded on the ground that the transaction really amounted to an appointment of a moiety of the fund to C., and then a settlement of the appointed share for the benefit of C. and her children, without the consent of either C. or her husband. We do not quite see how the non-consent of the husband could have affected the case; for an appointment of a moiety of the fund to C. for her separate use would undoubtedly have been good; and as the property was personal, C. might then have disposed of her interest, although reversionary, in any way she chose. Otherwise this case seems to us to afford a very apt illustration of the principle under discussion; and it likewise shews how studiously a Court of equity will seek out the purpose which the donee had in view when executing the power, and, while it disregards the form, will scrupulously examine the effect of the instrument by which that purpose is sought to be accomplished.

We have now noticed the most important of those cases of which we proposed to treat respecting the validity of appointments to children, and we think we are justified in coming to a conclusion—which must be a matter of congratulation to all who are jealous of the uniformity of the law and the harmony of judicial opinions—that these cases, while they exemplify very fully the bearing and limits of the rules laid down by Lord St. Leonards in his standard treatise upon the subject, yet do not tend in any degree to repudiate the principles which he has enunciated, or to weaken the authority of the ancient law.

The decision with regard to dock warrants which created so much surprise, not to say alarm, in the mercantile world can scarcely possess more interest than the now pending point of law respecting crossed cheques. To a country like ours, dependent for prosperity upon its commerce, negotiable instruments are of primary importance. It is not, therefore, surprising that the laws regulating the rights and liabilities of bankers and their customers, with regard to forged cheques paid by the bank, are so well ascertained that questions of novelty and difficulty rarely occur. The point in Simmonds v. *Taylor, which was tried before the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas on the 16th February last, involves the construction to be put upon the recent act relating to drafts on bankers, (19 & 20 Vict. c. 25). The London Joint-stock Bank having paid a crossed cheque, from which the crossing had been fraudulently erased, the question was, whether the bank or the customer should bear the loss; and it is to the facts of the case, and to the unsatisfactory state of the law under that statute, that we propose to direct the attention of our readers. Shortly stated, the facts were these:—The plaintiff, a customer of the bank, having drawn a cheque for 125*l.*, payable to bearer, crossed in blank in the usual way, with the words "& Co.," caused it to be sent to the person to whom he intended to pay it. It was transmitted by post, but in its passage through the post the letter containing it was lost. The empty envelope, with the words "the finder is much obliged" written on it, was left at the house to which the letter had been addressed, and some stranger presented the cheque at the bank, and it was paid over the counter in the ordinary course of business. Before it was presented the crossing had been obliterated with such nicety as almost to defy detection, and, at the time when it was presented, there was nothing at once visible to the naked eye to shew that it had been crossed, and it was only by the closest scrutiny, as by holding it up to the light, that the crossing could be discovered. Now, the stat. 19 & 20 Vict. c. 25, s. 1, provides as follows:—"In every case where a draft on any banker, made payable to bearer or to order on demand, bears across its face an addition in writing or stamped letters of the name of any banker, or of the words 'and company' in full or abbreviated, either of such additions shall have the force of a direction to the bankers upon whom such draft is made, that the same is to be paid only to or through some banker, and the same shall be payable only to or through some banker." The question arising on the statute was complicated at the trial by the charges of negligence which were made on both sides; but the jury found that there was no negligence on either side, either on the part of the plaintiff in drawing, crossing, or transmitting the cheque, or on the part of the bank in paying it. The point reserved was, therefore, disembarrassed of the difficulties arising out of disputed facts, and is simply, whether, in the absence of negligence on either side, upon the application of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 25, s. 1, to the facts above narrated, the bank or the customer is to bear the loss. It will be further necessary to decide whether the fraudulent obliteration of the crossing of a cheque amounts to forgery, and whether a banker is relieved from liability when a cheque bears no traces of crossing visible at once when it is presented, though it was crossed before it left the hands of his customer.

It is undoubtedly the law, that in general, if a banker pays a forged cheque, though in the ordinary course of business the forgery could not be discovered, he is bound to pay the amount again to his customer—that is, provided the customer has used due care in the drawing. (Hall v. Fuller, 5 B. & Cr. 750; Young v. Grote, 4 Bing. 258; Marzetti v. Williams, 1 B. & Ad. 415). The principle upon which this obligation is cast upon the banker is, that it is his duty, arising out of his employment, to be acquainted with his customer's handwriting; and that the payment of a forged cheque is an act done without authority—an unforeseen and accidental circumstance—proceeding not "ex causâ mandati sed occasione tantum"—against which an indemnity by the customer is not to be implied. (Hall v. Fuller, 5 B. & Cr. 752, referring to Pothier's Treatise du Contrat du Change). It seems clear also that the banker's liability is not confined to written forgeries. Where the pieces of a cancelled cheque, which had been torn up, were pasted together, and it was paid under circumstances of negligence, the banker was held liable. (Scholey v. Ramsbottom, 2 Camp. 485). It is to be expected that the decision of the Court upon the point reserved will be guided by these principles; but at the trial the Chief Justice declined giving an opinion as to the construction of the statute, and it would be worse than idle to speculate on the result. The principle object for which we notice the case is to warn the Profession and the public against the defective state of the law in general with respect to crossed cheques, and the jeopardy in which their transactions, by means of these instruments, are involved by the statute. The act was passed for the purpose of settling the much vexed question as to the obligation of a banker to pay a crossed cheque only to or through another banker; and if it had succeeded in doing that alone, it would have done well. But it appears to us that by implication it does more than that, and more than was contemplated by the Legislature: it makes the crossing a material part of the instrument, which it was not before. (Bellamy v. Majoribanks, 7 Exch. 403). It gives an entirely new legal effect to it, and to any alteration in it; and consequently, although, before the act, a bonâ fide holder of a cheque payable to bearer might strike out a special crossing by the drawer, and insert another, without prejudicing his rights upon the instrument, it is a matter of considerable doubt whether he could do so now. Before the act, the crossing, whether in blank or special, did not restrain the negotiability of the cheque either to the banker named, or a banker only, but was a mere memorandum, for the protection of the owner, that the holder was to present it for payment through a banker. Payment otherwise than to a banker would have been strong evidence of negligence; but where the drawer inserted the name of his own banker, and that was fraudulently struck out, and the name of another banker inserted, the payment of the double-crossed cheque was held no additional evidence of negligence. (Bellamy v. Majoribanks, 7 Exch. 389, 402; Stewart v. Lee, 1 Moo. & M. 161; Carlon v. Ireland, 5 El. & Bl. 765).

In the last-mentioned case, which led to the passing of the act, it was held that the crossing did not restrain the negotiability of the cheque, but threw upon the individual who (not being a banker) cashed it the duty of shewing that he received it bonâ fide for value. Can it be said with certainty now that the crossing is only a memorandum for the protection of the owner? Or, admitting the cheque to be only payable through a banker, is it a matter free from doubt that a crossing by the drawer, supposing the owner to strike it out, and insert another crossing, imposes no more restraint upon the negotiability than such crossing by the drawer would have done before the statute? Would payment of a double-crossed cheque now be deemed no additional evidence of negligence? If the crossing is now a material part of the instrument, as it appears to be under the statute, who can foretell the consequences of an alteration in it? The statute notices no distinction between a crossing made by the drawer and made by the owner. It contains but one other clause besides that set out above, which interprets the meaning of "banker;" and whilst the important questions suggested above, and others, are left in doubt, and to be settled by litigation when they may happen to arise, there is no saving clause—nothing to protect those legal incidents of crossed cheques which were understood before the alteration of the law. In Bellamy v. Majoribanks there was a great conflict of evidence as to whether it was the usage of bankers to pay a cheque specially crossed by the drawer only to the banker named. The jury found that the usage was to pay only to such banker; but ultimately the Court directed a new trial, which never took place. It cannot be said that this point is free from doubt; and when the Legislature interfered, the question should have been cleared up.

We think, that in the introduction of the new law, its effect upon the existing law and upon transactions necessarily affected by the change has not been sufficiently borne in mind. It is not to be supposed that remote contingencies are to be provided against; but a new law is very defective when the natural consequences of it are overlooked. This statute has already failed in one of the objects mentioned in its preamble—the prevention of crime; and we doubt whether it will greatly add "to the ease of commerce." In general, the prolixity of our statutes is their bane; but this runs into the opposite extreme. It is brief, but obscure; and the magnitude of the interests affected by it, the exigencies of commerce, and the convenience of individuals, call for more careful legislation.

BETTS'S PATENT BRANDY has ever since its introduction to the public been recognised, both by scientific men and the trade, as the best article ever manufactured in this country. Its claims to such pre-eminence are based upon its unrivalled purity, and its closer assimilation than any other to the flavour of the finest Champagne Brandy.

There has been no Brandy made from wine in France either in the present year or in the preceding one. Owing to the successive failures in their vintages, the French wine-grower gets a higher price for his wine, consumed as such, than he can realise by its being distilled into Brandy; and forasmuch as the Foreign Brandy of recent importations is but the product of British grain and beet-root spirits, the prestige hitherto exclusively enjoyed by French Brandy as having been distilled from a particular French wine no longer exists, and is no longer worthily assignable to it now that it is bunglingly made from other materials. The supply of wine for distillation into Brandy having failed, the French distiller is constrained to recur to a manufacture in which he needs the quarter of a century's experience which has been exercised upon that of BETTS'S PATENT BRANDY, to render his article respectably competitive, and he has not had it. Under these circumstances the Messrs. BETTS challenge that their PATENT BRANDY is superior to any now made abroad.

It is to the interest of the public and the Messrs. Betts that these facts should be widely spread, for recent importations are of a quality so inferior as to disgrace the name they bear, and are twice the price of BETTS'S PATENT BRANDY, which is supplied by the trade to private families in any quantity, down to the single capsuled bottle. Excise regulations prevent its sale from the DISTILLERY, 7, SMITHFIELD-BARS, ST. JOHN-STREET, in any less quantity than two gallons.

CAUTION.—TO TRADESMEN, MERCHANTS, SHIPPERS, OUTFITTERS, &c.

WHEREAS it has lately come to my knowledge that some unprincipled person or persons have for some time past been imposing upon the public, by selling to the Trade and others a spurious article under the name of BOND'S PERMANENT MARKING INK; this is to give Notice, that I am the original and sole Proprietor and Manufacturer of the said Article, and do not employ any traveller, or authorise any persons to represent themselves as coming from my establishment, for the purpose of selling the said Ink. This Caution is published by me to prevent further imposition upon the public, and serious injury to myself.

E. R. BOND, Sole Executrix and Widow of the late John Bond, 28, Long-lane, West Smithfield, London.

 To avoid disappointment from the substitution of counterfeits, be careful to ask for the genuine Bond's Permanent Marking Ink; and further to distinguish it, observe that NO SIXPENNY SIZE is or has at any time been prepared by him, the Inventor and Proprietor.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, MAY 2, 1857.

AN able correspondent has addressed to us a letter (which appears in our number of the 4th April) on the subject of the inrolment of conveyances to burial boards. His remarks deserve attentive consideration, although we cannot say that they have changed our opinion on the matter.

With respect to the first point, viz. whether a conveyance to a burial board is a conveyance to a charitable use, we do not think, on a renewed examination of the cases, that there is any conflict between Lord Eldon and Sir J. Leach on this head. The remarks of Sir J. Leach, which we cited in our leading article of the 21st March, refer to two classes of funds, collected compulsorily, under the authority of Parliament, for a public purpose, viz. funds derived solely from the persons who are to be benefited by the works to be done, and funds derived wholly or in part from other persons. The funds in The Attorney-General v. Brown (1 Swanst. 265) were of the latter description, and Sir J. Leach, with respect to such funds, expresses himself much to the same effect as Lord Eldon, but lays down the law more broadly, and then pointedly draws a distinction with regard to the former class, which he does not consider as constituting a gift at all. The observations of Lord Eldon in The Attorney-General v. The Mayor of Dublin (1 Bligh, N. S., 334) are obscure from their conciseness, it not being at first sight apparent to what point in The Attorney-General v. Heelis he is referring when he treats it as inconsistent with The Attorney-General v. Brown. Sir J. Wigram, in Nightingale v. Goulburn, (5 Hare, 488), says, "I do not collect that the law laid down in The Attorney-General v. Heelis was disapproved by Lord Eldon, but that the law as laid down in that case, if correct, tended to shew that in The Attorney-General v. Brown Lord Eldon had felt unnecessary difficulties in deciding the case." It must be observed that Lord Eldon says, (1 Bligh, N. S., 334), "The case of The Attorney-General v. Brown, whether well or ill decided, was not decided solely upon the ground that it was a charitable use. Upon reflection, I thought it so, but the judgment proceeded upon other grounds." Now, if Sir J. Leach's affirmative statement in The Attorney-General v. Heelis, as to what are charitable uses, be correct, the use in The Attorney-General v. Brown was clearly charitable, and there was no occasion to resort to any other grounds. Lord Langdale (6 Beav. 230) appears also to have thought that the only doubt expressed as to The Attorney-General v. Heelis was, whether Sir J. Leach had not laid down a proposition which would include within the description of "charitable funds" funds which did not properly come within it. We think, however, (though we cannot but feel some diffidence in propounding an interpretation of Lord Eldon's observations differing from that adopted by such high authority), that if The Attorney-General v. The Mayor of Dublin be carefully examined, it will be found that the point of conflict between The Attorney-General v. Heelis and The Attorney-General v. Brown, to which Lord Eldon adverted, was one wholly distinct from the question of charity or no charity. The question in all three suits was simply whether a Court of equity had jurisdiction to compel an account, and whether the use was charitable or not was perfectly immaterial, supposing a right to an account in equity existed independently of charity. In The Attorney-General v. Brown, Lord Eldon held that the use was charitable; but, as he himself tells us in the remarks above quoted, he held also that there was jurisdiction to compel an account whether the use was charitable or not. Whether this can be inferred from the report of The Attorney-

General v. Brown is, of course, immaterial to the present question, which is, merely, what Lord Eldon meant by his remarks in The Attorney-General v. The Mayor of Dublin. Then came The Attorney-General v. Heelis, a case very similar to The Attorney-General v. Brown. Sir J. Leach held that there was no jurisdiction to compel an account unless the use was charitable. He laid down a broad proposition as to what uses were charitable—a proposition in no way conflicting with The Attorney-General v. Brown—and another as to what uses were not charitable, which also, we apprehend, would not exclude such a trust as that in The Attorney-General v. Brown. Now, if, bearing this in mind, we read through the observations of Lord Eldon made at the close of the argument in The Attorney-General v. The Mayor of Dublin, (1 Bligh, N. S., 334), we think it will be clearly seen that the substance of what Lord Eldon says is this—"In The Attorney-General v. Brown I held that the use was charitable, but that there was a right to an account whether it was charitable or not; and the latter was the principle on which I founded my judgment. In The Attorney-General v. Heelis, Sir J. Leach held that there was no right to an account unless the use was charitable, and the research into the old books confirms my view rather than his."

We cannot by any means agree in thinking the judgment of Sir J. Leach, independently of authority, so unsatisfactory as our correspondent considers it. The distinction which that learned judge took was not between the application to build a church and to erect gas-lamps—a distinction which could hardly have occurred to his mind when he was dwelling on the importance to be attached to the source whence the fund came. He took what appears to us to be a very common-sense view—that the Legislature, in levying rates upon the inhabitants of a town for the purpose of improving that town, is not making a gift to them. When, on the other hand, the rates are not levied exclusively upon the body of persons for whose benefit they are to be applied, it may reasonably be said that the Legislature is making a gift to them.

We do not think that Sir J. Leach meant to say merely that the funds adverted to in his dictum were not subject to the jurisdiction of a Court of equity. Such an interpretation does not seem to us consistent with the scope of his judgment, taken as a whole. He treats the question, whether the funds are charitable or not, as deciding the point, whether a Court of equity has jurisdiction. He then says, that the source of the funds is to be looked to in deciding whether the use is charitable; and ends by saying, that because funds of a certain description are not "derived from bounty or charity," they are not "charitable funds to be administered by this Court." Looking to the train of reasoning, and to the fact that there is not in his judgment any reference whatever to charitable funds not subject to be administered by the Court, we cannot entertain any doubt that his concluding words were intended to express, "are not charitable funds, and therefore not liable to be administered by this Court;" he having said shortly before, that in the case before him there was no jurisdiction to compel an account unless the funds were charitable.

The object of the act, as our correspondent observes, was no doubt to check the conveyance of land to charitable purposes, whether such conveyance be made with a charitable intent or not; but we do not see that it follows that the spirit of the act is infringed by holding that the money must be contributed with a charitable intent. This seems to us to assume the point in question, viz. whether the source from which the funds come is to be regarded in deciding whether the use is a charitable one.

With respect to the operation of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, upon the earlier statute, (9 Geo. 2, c. 36), we certainly cannot put the case so high as to say that the latter act necessarily repeals the former as to inrolment in this particular case. It certainly would be possible to make the conveyances under the later act comply with the requisition of the earlier as to inrolment. We still think, however, that on a fair construction the later act takes away, in the cases within its scope, the restrictions imposed by the earlier. We think that if the Legislature had, before the passing of the 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, directed a body to make certain purchases for a certain specific charitable purpose, and enacted that every conveyance made to them for that purpose in a certain specified form should be valid, the 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, would have been held not to apply to conveyances made under the former, for that the principle generalia specialibus non derogant would have governed the case; (see Sir Foulke Grevil's case, 3 Jenk. 41); and we do not see that any distinction unfavourable to the board is to be drawn from the fact that the general restrictive statute was the earlier of the two. The principle seems safely applicable in a case where the result of holding it not to be so would be to convict the Legislature of the inconsistency of directing a particular act to be done, and at the same time imposing upon the doing it various troublesome restrictions, devised for the very purpose of preventing such acts from being done.

Few branches of our law have undergone greater modification by change of opinion alone, and without any statutory interference, than that which relates to the maintenance of suits and actions. So jealous formerly were our judges of the intervention of third parties in litigation, that they adopted and promulgated views upon the subject which at the present day appear to be absurd and extreme. The influence exercised by power and wealth over witnesses, jurors, and it may be judges, was doubtless stronger in former times than in our own, and often so strong and so corrupt as to work manifest injustice; but still we can hardly understand the state of society in which it was considered necessary, by judicial decision, to bring within the offence of maintenance such apparently innocent acts as to persuade one to be counsel for another gratis—to go with another to inquire for a person learned in the law—for a juror to solicit a judge to give judgment according to the verdict—for a man of power and interest to stand by another while his cause was being tried, though he said nothing—or for a man of power, not learned in the law, telling another, who asked his advice, that he had a good title*. The extreme opinions, however, which prevailed upon this subject are doubtless long since exploded, but the effect of the old doctrine of maintenance is still felt in the rule upheld by our common-law Courts, that a chose in action is not assignable so as to give the assignee a right of action in his own name. Upon this point we cannot do better than cite the clear and forcible observations of Buller, J., in Master v. Miller, (4 T. R. 320, 340). "It is laid down," said that learned judge, "in our old books, that for avoiding maintenance a chose in action cannot be assigned or granted over to another. The good sense of that rule seems to me to be very questionable, and in early as well as modern times it has been so explained away, that it remains at most only an objection to the form of action in any case. In 2 Roll. Ab. 45, 46, it is admitted that an obligation or other deed may be granted so that the writing passes; but it is said that the grantee cannot sue for it in his own name. If a third person be permitted to acquire the interest in a thing, whether he is to bring the action in his own name or in the name of the grantor does not seem to me to affect the question of maintenance. It is curious, and not altogether useless, to see how the doctrine of maintenance has from time to time been received at Westminster Hall. At one time not only he who laid out money to assist another in his cause, but he that by his friendship or interest saved him an expense which he would otherwise have been put to, was held guilty of maintenance. (Bro. Ab., tit. 'Maintenance,' 7, 14, 17, &c.) Nay, if he officiously gave evidence it was maintenance; so that he must have had a subpœna or suppress the truth. That such doctrine, repugnant to every honest feeling of the human heart, should be soon laid aside must be expected. Accordingly a variety of exceptions was soon made; and, amongst others, it was held, that if a person has any interest in the thing in difference, though on contingency only, he may lawfully maintain an action on it. (2 Roll. Ab. 115). But, in the midst of all these doctrines on maintenance, there was one case in which the Courts of law allowed of an assignment of a chose in action, and that was in the case of the Crown; for the Courts did not feel themselves bold enough to tie up the property of the Crown, or to prevent that from being transferred. (3 Leon. 198; 2 Cro. 183). Courts of equity from the earliest times thought the doctrine too absurd for them to adopt, and therefore they always acted in direct contradiction to it; and we shall soon see that Courts of law also altered their language on the subject very much. In 12 Mod. 554, the Court speaks of an assignment of an apprentice or an assignment of a bond as things which are good between the parties, and to which they must give their sanction, and act upon. So an assignment of a chose in action has always been held a good consideration for a promise. It was so in 1 Roll. Ab. 29; Sid. 212; and Jones, 222; and, lastly, by all the judges of England in Mouldale v. Birchall, (2 Bl. 820), though the debt assigned was uncertain. After these cases we may venture to say that the maxim was a bad one, and that it proceeded on a foundation which fails. But still it must be admitted, that though the Courts of law have gone the length of taking notice of assignments of choses in action, and of acting upon them, yet in many cases they have adhered to the formal objection, that the action shall be brought in the name of the assignor, and not of the assignee. I see no use or convenience in preserving that shadow when the substance is gone; and that it is merely a shadow is apparent from the later cases, in which the Courts have taken care that it shall never work injustice."

---

* See Bac. Ab., tit. "Maintenance," for these and other instances.

It is time to alter this rule of law, and to recognise in all our courts, for all purposes, the rights pertaining to an assignee of choses in action. We doubt also whether the whole doctrine of maintenance may not be usefully swept from our laws; for, after all, what offence is there in aiding a man to assert his rightful claims—and on questions of maintenance they are assumed to be rightful—or what legal damage is sustained by him against whom such rights are asserted? The malicious instigation of suits and actions without reasonable or probable cause is a very different matter; but for this an action will lie, quite independently of the doctrine of maintenance. It is analogous to the action for a malicious prosecution, as was said by Patteson, J., in the case of Flight v. Leman, (4 Q. B. 883). (See also Pechell v. Watson, 8 M. & W. 691).

With regard to champerty, which is but a species of maintenance, it is difficult to see why parties should not be allowed to settle for themselves terms of payment for services rendered. If the "campi partitio" appears to them a better mode of remuneration than a gross sum of money, why should they not adopt it? The common law and the rules of equity would be sufficient, we presume, without resorting to maintenance or champerty, to meet cases of fraud and undue advantage, and also to render illegal such an agreement as came to light in Sprye v. Porter, (3 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 330)—namely, to supply sufficient evidence to recover property, in consideration of having a share of it.

THE PRINCIPLES OF THE REGISTRATION QUESTION.

The details of the joint Report of the Registration of Title Commission, and of Mr. Wilson's separate report, may be left until the subject shall be fairly before Parliament. A question of above twenty years' standing, and of more than twenty successive attempts at legislation, will certainly not be disposed of, and probably not even be handled, by the Legislature before the close of the impending short session; yet there are broad principles involved which should at once be brought forward, and be steadfastly kept in sight, now that the results of the labours of the commission have become public. This is the more requisite, as the joint report, disregarding these principles, confounds objects that are entirely distinct, and which up to the present time have been, and in Mr. Wilson's report are now, kept in their proper places.

The objects in view in dealing with the law of the sale and transfer of land are three—simplification of title, manifestation of title, and indefeasibility of title. We propose briefly to shew that they are independent of each other. The joint report makes them all dependent on registration of title. Thus, in paragraph 25 we read—"The main desiderata to which attention is most anxiously directed are not so much security of title, (for that in fact is, to a great extent, practically obtained), but the simplification of title, facility of transfer, simplicity of form, and the consequent diminution of delay and expense. To obtain these advantages a registration of title is the remedy proposed." And the joint report, after discussing and disposing of three such proposals, finally proposes its own plan of registration of title. Again, in paragraph 40—"The problem which has to be solved is this—by what means, consistently with the preservation of existing rights, can we now obtain such a system of registration as will enable owners to deal with land in as simple and easy a manner, as far as the title is concerned and the difference in the nature of the subject-matter may allow, as they now can deal with moveable chattels or stock?" And at paragraph 42—"The objects in view are . . . . to form this register [of title] in such a manner that the retrospective inquiry into the former dealings and transactions, which on a transfer is now necessary, may be avoided; to make this register instrumental in simplifying the title to land, and the forms of conveyances," &c.

First, then, as to simplification of title. There is no conceivable simplification that might not be effected by an act going directly to the point. For instance, the law might provide that a purchaser should not be affected with any notice of equitable interests, (as by sect. 20 of the Companies Clauses Act). Further: it might provide, as regards particular estates and remainders, that the freeholder in possession might sell, (as under the Lands Clauses Act), without being obliged to pay the purchase money into court; or, if that were thought unsafe, then that in all cases there should be a power of sale over land; and that if land were settled or disposed of without such a power, then that some proper tribunal should appoint a person to have such a power; the necessity for the power would be analogous to the feudal necessity that there should always be a tenant of the freehold; or a law might be made doing away with entails, or with legal remainders altogether—changing all estates but that of the legal fee into equitable estates, not binding on a purchaser. The actual proposal of the joint report, namely, to merge all distinctions of estates into the grand distinction of "registered and unregistered interests," means, in itself, no more than some such change. A division into 'public and private interests," or "market and non-market interests," or any other correlatives, shewing that a purchaser need deal only with the former, without regarding the latter, would answer the purpose, without any reference to registration. Protection to the "private" or "non-market" interests might be afforded equally well by the entry of a caveat on the title deed, to be looked at by a purchaser, as it could on a register.

Next as regards the second object in view—manifestation of title. This is the true object of registration. Whatever be the law as to title, the use of a register is merely to enable a purchaser to apply the law with certainty and facility; in other words, to prevent the uncertainty and difficulty which arise from loss, destruction, suppression, or falsification, and from dispersion, or distant or inconvenient custody, of title deeds. A register of title, as distinguished from a register of assurances, means properly a register which points to the ownership, as deducible from the deeds, instead of incumbering itself with the deeds themselves. This is Mr. Wilson's view. It is not the office of registration of title so to revolutionise title, that, regardless of every other consideration, it may be conveniently put on a register. There is no magic or summum bonum in registration. The character of title must be determined by considerations of its own—the exigencies of the social, political, and natural character of land in each particular country, under each particular form of government, in each particular state of the commerce of life and of wealth. Here, again, the very simplicity of the plan of transfer proposed by the joint report (the stock plan) renders registration unnecessary. Will any one contend, that, were it not for the purpose of making out the dividend warrants, stock might not far more easily, and just as safely, be transferred by the indorsement of a Government debenture as a cargo is by a bill of lading? Registration of land has been attempted for the last five-and-twenty years, on account of the complexity of title. Cut the knot with the commissioners' sword, and by the very act registration of any sort becomes superfluous labour.

We now come to the last object—indefeasibility of title—that is, relief to the purchaser from any obligation to look into or regard the back title. Here, though some official person—call him registrar-general, or what you will—must act, his office will not be that of a registrar, but of an inspector, of transfers. His certificate that the seller is registered owner (as proposed by the joint report) will be nothing more than a certificate that the transfers have been duly made up to that time. But that duty does not imply any necessity that those transfers should be on a register. He could equally well, as a matter of principle, though not with equal facility, give a certificate of title upon a sale made under the existing law. Under an improved state of the law of real property—improved for the purpose of simplifying title—an officer might give such a certificate with a proportionally greater degree of facility. Just as now, an officer, by inspecting successive documents, might declare that a banker, lending on a dock warrant, had an indefeasible title to so many hogsheads of sugar.

The more desirable it is to assimilate the transfer of land, as nearly as circumstances will permit, to the transfer of a cargo—to supply those desiderata which are set forth in the joint report—to solve that problem which is proposed (or rather as it ought to have been proposed) by the commissioners—to attain those objects which they have in view—the more desirable, we say, all this is, the more necessary is it to have at the outset clear ideas in the matter. Let each member of the subject rest in its proper place and in its natural dimensions, and not be thus forced down and strained on the commissioners' Procrustes-bed of registration.

RESTRAINT ON ANTICIPATION IN APPOINTMENTS TO CHILDREN.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—In connexion with the subject of appointments to children in execution of powers, so ably treated in THE JURIST of last and the preceding week, the question of the validity of an appointment made to a daughter for her separate use, without power of anticipation, may, perhaps, be deemed worthy of some notice. A somewhat recent decision of Sir W. P. Wood, V. C., is calculated to make the law on this point somewhat difficult to be determined, when taken together with the cases which precede it on the same point. In Carver v. Bowles, (2 Russ. & M. 304), under an exclusive power in a marriage settlement over a fund in favour of children, the question of the validity of an appointment to daughters for their separate use, without power of anticipation, was raised; and Sir J. Leach held, "that it was competent to the donee of the power to limit the interests which he appointed to his daughters to their separate use, and to restrain them from anticipation or alienation." In Thornton v. Bright, (2 My. & C. 230), under a similar power over real estate, an appointment was made to trustees for the separate use of a daughter, without power of anticipation; and Lord Cottenham held, on appeal, reversing the decision of the Court below, that the appointment was valid. In Dickenson v. Short, (8 Hare, 178), under a power to charge real estate for portions for daughters, the donee of the power appointed to trustees, upon trust for his daughter, a married woman, for her life, for her separate use, without power of anticipation. The case was argued on the validity of the limitation in restraint of anticipation, when the Vice-Chancellor said, in giving judgment, that the argument for the husband (against the separate use and restraint on anticipation clause) must go the length of saying, that the donee of the power, having power to charge the estate with a certain sum, could not appoint less than the whole sum which he was empowered to give; for if he might appoint a smaller sum, why might he not, on the same principle, appoint less than an absolute interest? If the donee of the power might appoint a smaller sum than that which the utmost exercise of the power would enable him to give, as in this case he clearly could, why might he not also make the appointment for the life of the object of the power, or render the interest of the appointee determinable upon certain acts, or introduce provisions restraining the appointee in this case from parting with the property during the coverture? He was of opinion that there was nothing invalid in the restrictive terms of the appointment, and that the daughter must be declared to be entitled to the sum in question for her separate use, without power of anticipation. In the face of these authorities, and directly opposed to them, comes the subsequent decision of Sir W. P. Wood, V. C., in Fry v. Capper, (1 Kay, 163), alluded to above. In this case, under a power of appointment of a trust fund among children in the usual form, the share of a married daughter was limited to trustees, upon trust for her separate use for life, without power of anticipation. It was argued that the restraint upon anticipation would have infringed the rule against perpetuities if inserted in the settlement, and that it therefore rendered the appointment void; and Sir W. P. Wood, V. C., in a judgment by no means remarkable for its clearness, is considered to have decided that the clause in restraint of anticipation was invalid, but that the appointment was otherwise good, and that the invalid condition might be rejected. With respect to this case it may be observed, that neither Carver v. Bowles nor Dickenson v. Short seems to have been cited in the argument; and with respect to Thornton v. Bright, the Vice-Chancellor observes, "that though the limitations in that case were precisely similar to that he was deciding, the particular point of the validity of a clause restraining anticipation did not seem to have been argued." This could not have been said if the case of Dickenson v. Short had been cited; and it is doubtful if the Vice-Chancellor would have come to the same conclusion if that case, together with the previous case of Carver v. Bowles, in both of which the point was expressly raised, had been brought to his Honor's notice. It is submitted, that until further decisions on the point have been made, the law with respect to the validity of a clause in restraint of anticipation in an appointment to a daughter is in anything but a settled and satisfactory state.

I remain, Sir, your obedient servant,

Chancery-lane, April 28, 1857. H. P. W.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—Having had occasion to make the following resumé of the principles upon which voluntary conveyances have been enforced in equity, I send it to you in the hope that it may usefully contribute to a discussion which has been commenced, but not I think exhausted, in your columns.

(A.)—Property can be assigned to or on behalf of volunteers by assignments valid at law, and the Court of equity will allow such transactions their legal effect. (Antrobus v. Smith, 12 Ves. 46).

When the trustee to whom the legal assignment has been made declines to act, equity will enforce payment of the debt for the benefit of the voluntary cestui que trust, (Bridge v. Bridge, 16 Beav. 315), upon the grounds that the grantor has done every act which it was necessary for him to do to render the trust complete; (Antrobus v. Smith, 16 Ves. 39; Ex parte Pye, 18 Ves. 149); that the property vests in the trustee at once, subject to his choosing afterwards to disclaim; (Siggers v. Evans, 5 El. & Bl. 382); and that a cestui que trust (whether a volunteer or not is immaterial) shall not be prejudiced by the conduct of his trustee. (Fortescue v. Barnett, 3 My. & K. 36; Fletcher v. Fletcher, 4 Hare, 67).

(B.)—Property can be assigned to a volunteer, or a right to damages for its non-assignment given to him by instruments not amounting to a legal assignment. Ex gra.—

1. A deed purporting to assign a thing not assignable at law, but containing a covenant, either express, as in Ward v. Audland, (16 M. & W. 862), or implied, as in Aulten v. Atkins, (18 C. B. 249), for better assigning and transferring the choses in action purporting to be assigned by the voluntary deed containing the covenant.

Equity will not enforce the specific performance of the covenant at the suit of a volunteer; (Colman v. Sarrel, 1 Ves. jun. 50; Ellison v. Ellison, 6 Ves. 656); but the covenant creates a debt, and equity, following the law, will enforce that debt in the administration of the assets of the covenantor; (Fletcher v. Fletcher, 4 Hare, 67; Cox v. Bernard, 8 Hare, 310); and if the covenantee is a trustee, and refuses to act, equity will interfere, (4 Hare, 77), upon the same principle as that upon which it acts in favour of a voluntary cestui que trust, to whose trustee, as in case (A.), the legal ownership has been transferred.

In the same manner a warranty in a deed assigning property in a legal mode, where the assignment was defeated by a subsequent sale, creates a debt enforceable in equity against the assets of the grantor. (Williamson v. Codrington, 1 Ves. sen.)

2. A deed purporting to assign a thing not assignable at law, but containing a power of entry.

A grant of goods not in possession of the grantor at the time is void unless ratified by some further act after he has acquired the property therein, but a power of entry over future property may be given in a deed which grants present property. (Tapfield v. Hillman, 6 Man. & G. 245). Till the power is executed by the grantee taking possession of the property, future at the date of the deed, he has no legal or equitable title, but upon his taking possession he would be in the same position as if the debtor had delivered the property to him. (Congreve v. Evetts, 10 Exch. 298).

It is apprehended that if such a power were given to a trustee, as in Hope v. Hayley, (5 El. & Bl. 830), and he refused to enter, the cestui que trust would have a remedy in equity analogous to those given in the cases (A.) and (B.) 1; but the case, it is believed, has not arisen.

3. A deed purporting to assign, but not legally assigning, a thing not assignable at law, but containing a power of attorney.

This was the case in Blakely v. Brady, (2 Dru. & W. 311). By a voluntary deed a promissory note was assigned to a trustee, with a power of attorney to the trustee to sue on behalf of the assignor. The assignor died; his administrator refused to allow his name to be used by the trustee. The Court decreed that the trusts should be carried into execution, on the ground that nothing remained for the assignor to do in order to make the gift to the assignee absolute. The transaction was "complete" within the meaning of the principle laid down in Fortescue v. Barnett, (3 My. & K. 36). The decision in Blakely v. Brady, though contrary to a dictum in Ward v. Audland, (8 Beav. 211), has been cited with approbation in Kekewich v. Manning, (1 De G., Mac., & G. 176), and followed in Parnell v. Hingston, (2 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 854).

4. A deed purporting to assign a thing non-assignable at law, if it remains in the power of the assignee to render the transaction complete.

Thus, in Fortescue v. Barnett, (3 My. & K. 36), a policy of insurance was assigned by deed to the trustees, who omitted to give notice of the assignment to the insurance office; the insurer kept the policy in his possession; it was held that the fault of the trustees in not giving notice to the office should not prejudice the right of the cestui que trust where title would otherwise have been complete against the assignor. In Edwards v. Jones (1 My. & C. 226) it was held that an assignor who assigned a bond by writing not under seal, and delivered the bond at the same time to the assignee, had not done all that was required of him to make the transaction complete.

5. A declaration of trust by the absolute owner.

When the beneficial owner is also legal owner, the only instrument required is one declaring that he holds the property in trust for the volunteer. Upon this equity will act. (Ex parte Pye, 18 Ves. 149; Bridge v. Bridge, 16 Beav. 315). So, if a person directed money at his bankers to be carried to an account in the joint names of himself as trustee, and of the cestuis que trust, and the banker give a promissory note for the amount to him as trustee, he holds that promissory note as trustee, and equity will enforce the trust. (Wheatley v. Parr, 1 Kee. 551).

If the owner of a fund executes a deed, by which he declares that certain persons should be possessed of stock then standing in his name for him during his life, and after his decease should hold it in trust for other persons, and after his decease the stock is transferred to the trustees of the deed, the Court will not interfere to dispossess the trustees at the suit of persons interested under the will of the settlor. (Airey v. Hall, 2 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 658).

6. A declaration of trust by the beneficial owner who is not legal owner.

The beneficial owner is the proper person to make the declaration of trust; and a declaration of trust by the legal owner is unavailing unless the trusts are recognised and sanctioned by the beneficial owner. (Tierney v. Wood, 19 Beav. 336).

A legal fee in lands is vested in A. in trust for B.; B. signed a document, not attested, addressed to A., directing that the lands and other property should after his death be held in trust for other persons. This was an effectual declaration of trust within the 7th section of the Statute of Frauds, and enforced at the suit of volunteers. (Tierney v. Wood, 19 Beav. 336).

It has been decided that a beneficial owner may assign his equitable interest to a new cestui que trust without notice to the trustees, and the donee may compel transfer of the stock to him. (Donaldson v. Donaldson, Kay, 711). But in Bridge v. Bridge (16 Beav. 328) it was held that an equitable interest in land could not be assigned "without purporting to make the trustees" of the original instrument trustees of the voluntary assignment. This, however, is said by Lord St. Leonards (V. & P. 591, 13th ed.) to seem open to reconsideration.

A direction by an equitable mortgagee to the mortgagor, that on paying off his debt he should invest a certain portion of it in Consols for the benefit of the children of A., is a valid declaration of trust, and enforceable against a subsequent inconsistent direction by the mortgagee to pay the whole debt to her. (Paterson v. Murphy, 11 Hare, 88).

7. An equitable assignment of reversionary property. The theory of the Court with regard to equitable assignments is, that they pass no interest in the property: they are mere agreements to assign, which equity enforces against the conscience of the assignor at the suit of an assignee for value. (Carleton v. Leigh, 3 Mer. 667; Morse v. Faulkner, 3 Swanst. 429; Lyde v. Mynn, 1 My. & K. 695). But equity will not assist the volunteer in making the assignor do any act to complete a voluntary transaction, and therefore it has been held that a volunteer in whose favour an equitable assignment, or, in other words, an agreement to assign, has been made, would not assist the volunteer by requiring the assignor to perform his agreement. (Meek v. Kettlewell, 1 Hare, 464; 1 Ph. 342). But in the case of a reversionary interest an equitable assignment is the only mode of transfer, except by a declaration of trust, between which and an equitable assignment there is, if any, a very thin distinction. The assignor, by the assignment, does all that at the time he can do, and therefore it seems that equity will interfere to perfect the gift, at the time not left imperfect through any fault of the assignee or unwillingness of the assignor. In Sloane v. Cadogan, (Sugd. V. & P., 11th ed., App.); Kekewich v. Manning, (1 De G., Mac., & G. 176); and Vegie v. Hughes, (2 Sm. & G. 18), assignments of equitable reversionary interests have been enforced at the suit of volunteers.

I have supposed that the Court was moved in these cases by the consideration, that unless such assignments were supported in equity, reversionary interests could not be transferred inter vivos, except for value, or in the form of a declaration of trust; and the case put by Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, L. J., in Kekewich v. Manning (1 De G., Mac., & G. 188) illustrates the inconvenience that would follow from thus denying the competence of the owner of a reversionary interest to transfer it by way of bounty.

But if the doctrine of Donaldson v. Donaldson, (Kay, 711), supported by the query of Lord St. Leonards against the opposite doctrine in Bridge v. Bridge, should, as is not unlikely in the present disposition to facilitate the transfer of property, prevail, the power of equitable owners of property in possession to transfer their equitable interest will not be limited to declarations of trust as heretofore, but it will be competent for such persons to assign their equitable interests in possession to a volunteer, without notice to the trustees, and without purporting to make the trustees trustees for the assignee. The assignee would then be considered the beneficial owner in equity, and might compel the trustees to transfer the legal estate to him, subject only to the qualification, that if the trustees had, before notice of the assignment, transferred the legal estate to another person, the assignee would be without remedy. Although this must be considered an inroad on the old doctrine, that an equitable assignment passes no property, it will relieve the subject from much embarrassment, arising from the thin distinction between assignments of equitable interests and declarations of trusts (B. 6) of the same interests.

But however the question raised in Donaldson v. Donaldson may be hereafter settled, the proposition upon which Sir J. Stuart, V. C., acted in Parnell v. Hingston, (2 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 854)—viz. that if the owner of a chose in action makes a voluntary assignment to a trustee in trust for a third party, and gives the trustee a power of attorney, although the legal interest fails in being vested in the trustee, yet the trusts are thereby validly fastened on the property in the hands of the owner himself—seems to have been rather rashly censured by a correspondent, (ante, p. 92), who states it to be unsupported by principle or authority. I think that it will be found fully in accordance with the principles above deduced from the best authorities, and at variance only with a loose dictum in Ward v. Audland, (8 Beav. 202).

After this survey, it is perhaps unnecessary to add, that the dictum of Lord Cranworth in Soales v. Maude, (6 De G., Mac., & G. 51)—that "mere declaration of trust by the owner of property in favour of a volunteer is inoperative, and this Court will not interfere in such a case. The case is different where there has been a change of legal ownership, and so a trust has been constituted"—is wholly at variance with the established doctrine of the Court.

Hitherto the only voluntary settlements referred to have been those where the object of the donor is bounty; but there is a different class of voluntary conveyances—namely, those to trustees in trust to pay debts, depending upon a distinct set of principles and authorities, which it is essential, though often difficult, to keep clear of each other. (Browne v. Cavendish, 1 Jo. & Lat. 636; Simmonds v. Palles, 2 Jo. & Lat. 489).

(C.)—Property may be assigned by a voluntary deed to trustees, in trust to pay creditors, if the relation of trustee and cestui que trust is validly established; for "if the relation is established, there is consideration for the deed, and it is no longer voluntary." (Harland v. Binks, 15 Q. B. 713).

This relationship is established—

1. If the trustee is a creditor, no assent or notice to any other creditor is necessary, but the relationship is at once established, subject to the trustee choosing afterwards to disclaim. (Siggers v. Evans, 5 El. & Bl. 379).

2. If the trustee is not a creditor, but gives notice to a creditor, who verbally expresses himself satisfied with what is done, (Harland v. Binks, 15 Q. B. 713), upon the principle that the creditor may have refrained, in consequence of such notice, from pursuing his legal remedies, the creditor need not execute the deed. (Field v. Donoughmore, 1 Dru. & W. 227). Even actual assent may not be necessary if communication has been made to the creditor. (Siggers v. Evans, 5 El. & Bl. 377). Before notice to the creditor the deed is a mere power in the trustee, and is revocable by the debtor. (Acton v. Woodgate, 2 My. & K. 492; Smith v. Keating, 6 C. B. 136, 158).

3. Any creditor who assents to, or acts in accordance with, a deed becomes a cestui que trust; but where a creditor has taken any step inconsistent with the provisions of the deed, he will be deprived of all advantage therefrom. (Field v. Lord Donoughmore, 1 Dru. & W. 227; Watson v. Knight, 19 Beav. 369; Forbes v. Limond, 4 De G., Mac., & G. 315). But when a day is stipulated for the creditors to execute the deed, and no creditor, except the trustees, executes the deed, yet the creditors are entitled to have the trusts of it carried into execution. (Broadbent v. Thornton, 4 De G. & S. 65; Nicholson v. Tutin, 2 Kay & J. 18).

4. If the voluntary deed stipulate that creditors should sign within a certain time, and they do not, the deed is void at law; but if creditors who have not signed it have acted under it, it is good in equity. (Spottiswoode v. Stockdale, Coop. 102). C. S.

REGULA GENERALIS.

ORDER OF COURT.—Easter Term, 1857.

It is ordered, that plaintiffs suing in contract for 20*l.* or less may, if they claim costs, indorse on the writ of summons the following notice:—

> "Take notice, that if judgment be signed for default of appearance, the plaintiff will without summons apply to a judge for his costs of suit, unless before such judgment you shall give notice to him or his attorney that you intend to oppose such application."

And it is further ordered, that if the defendant give such notice, the plaintiff shall proceed by summons and order.

But if the defendant give no such notice, the plaintiff may produce such indorsement to a judge at chambers for an order for costs, ex parte, and if the judge shall sign his name to the indorsement, such signature shall be an order for costs, and the Master may tax them thereon accordingly. In case of any application for costs without such indorsement, the plaintiff shall not be entitled to more costs than if he had made such indorsement, unless a judge shall otherwise order.

Entry of Satisfaction on Judgments.

Upon a satisfaction piece, duly signed and attested in accordance with the 80th Rule of Hilary Term, 1853, being presented to the clerk of the judgments of the Masters in the court in which the judgment has been signed, he shall file the same and enter satisfaction in the judgment book against the entry of the said judgment, and no roll shall be required to be carried in for the purpose of entering satisfaction on a judgment.

BETTS'S PATENT BRANDY has ever since its introduction to the public been recognised, both by scientific men and the trade, as the best article ever manufactured in this country. Its claims to such pre-eminence are based upon its unrivalled purity, and its closer assimilation than any other to the flavour of the finest Champagne Brandy.

There has been no Brandy made from wine in France either in the present year or in the preceding one. Owing to the successive failures in their vintages, the French wine-grower gets a higher price for his wine, consumed as such, than he can realise by its being distilled into Brandy; and forasmuch as the Foreign Brandy of recent importations is but the product of British grain and beet-root spirits, the prestige hitherto exclusively enjoyed by French Brandy as having been distilled from a particular French wine no longer exists, and is no longer worthily assignable to it now that it is bunglingly made from other materials. The supply of wine for distillation into Brandy having failed, the French distiller is constrained to recur to a manufacture in which he needs the quarter of a century's experience which has been exercised upon that of BETTS'S PATENT BRANDY, to render his article respectably competitive, and he has not had it. Under these circumstances the Messrs. BETTS challenge that their PATENT BRANDY is superior to any now made abroad.

It is to the interest of the public and the Messrs. Betts that these facts should be widely spread, for recent importations are of a quality so inferior as to disgrace the name they bear, and are twice the price of BETTS'S PATENT BRANDY, which is supplied by the trade to private families in any quantity, down to the single capsuled bottle. Excise regulations prevent its sale from the DISTILLERY, 7, SMITHFIELD-BARS, ST. JOHN-STREET, in any less quantity than two gallons.

CAUTION.—TO TRADESMEN, MERCHANTS, SHIPPERS, OUTFITTERS, &c.

WHEREAS it has lately come to my knowledge that some unprincipled person or persons have for some time past been imposing upon the public, by selling to the Trade and others a spurious article under the name of BOND'S PERMANENT MARKING INK; this is to give Notice, that I am the original and sole Proprietor and Manufacturer of the said Article, and do not employ any traveller, or authorise any persons to represent themselves as coming from my establishment, for the purpose of selling the said Ink. This Caution is published by me to prevent further imposition upon the public, and serious injury to myself.

E. R. BOND, Sole Executrix and Widow of the late John Bond, 23, Long-lane, West Smithfield, London.

 To avoid disappointment from the substitution of counterfeits, be careful to ask for the genuine Bond's Permanent Marking Ink; and further to distinguish it, observe that NO SIXPENNY SIZE is or has at any time been prepared by him, the Inventor and Proprietor.

 Orders for THE JURIST given to any Newsman, or letter (post-paid) sent to the Office, No. 3, CHANCERY LANE, or to STEVENS & NORTON, 26, BELL YARD, LINCOLN'S INN, will insure its punctual delivery in London, or its being forwarded on the evening of publication, through the medium of the Post Office, to the Country.

Printed by HENRY HANSARD, at his Printing Office, in Parker Street, in the Parish of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, in the County of Middlesex; and Published at No. 3, CHANCERY LANE, in the Parish of St. Dunstan in the West, in the City of London, by HENRY SWEET, residing at No. 34, Porchester Terrace, Bayswater, in the County of Middlesex.—Saturday, May 2, 1857.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, MAY 9, 1857.

It has frequently happened that a deed or will, by which real estate has been limited in strict settlement, has contained a clause empowering the trustees named in the instrument, during the minority of any person beneficially entitled in possession, to accumulate the whole or a portion of the rents and profits; and a series of decisions has established, that, except where the accumulated fund is to be applied to the discharge of incumbrances upon the settled estate, or, in the case of a will, to the payment of the testator's debts, such a trust for accumulation is altogether void. The stat. 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 98, commonly called the Thellusson Act, had no influence in these decisions. They rested on a rule which prevailed antecedently to the passing of that statute, though then surrounded by much doubt, but which, as now settled, may perhaps be thus stated—that no instrument can lawfully create any trust or power, of which it cannot be said with certainty, at the time when the instrument comes into operation, that if lawful, it could not have, or that it could be prevented from having, the effect of suspending the full enjoyment of an estate in possession in real or personal property for a longer period than a life or lives in being at the date of the deed, or the death of the testator and twenty-one years after the decease of the survivor of the lives, or at a time more remote than the termination of that period. The statute merely confined the accumulation of income, both of real and personal estate, within narrower limits than those previously allowed by the rule against perpetuities, but did not operate to remove the total invalidity of the trusts or powers which exceeded the period prescribed by that rule.

In the class of cases mentioned above it is manifest that a course of events might occur, as if several successive tenants in tail were to die under age and leaving issue, in which the trust would outlast the authorised term; and therefore, at the first view, it seems hardly possible that any question could have arisen as to whether the decisions holding the trust to be invalid conformed strictly to the rule on which they professed to be founded. But the soundness of the reasoning by which we are brought to this conclusion has been impugned by more than one writer of eminence, especially by Mr. Lewis, in the Supplement to his work on Perpetuities; and only the other day the very same point was again raised in the case of Turvin v. Newcome, (3 Kay & J. 16; S. C., 3 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 203), which appears, however, to have conclusively determined that the law is what we have above laid down. We shall first endeavour to present a concise statement of the reasons which Mr. Lewis has advanced in support of the contrary opinion, and then, by the light which the case we have quoted affords us, to detect the brittle link in the chain of his argument.

Mr. Lewis's attacks have been mainly directed against the judgment in Browne v. Stoughton, (14 Sim. 369;

S. C., 10 Jur., part 1, p. 747), which, previously to the case of Turvin v. Newcome, was the leading, or at any rate the clearest, authority upon the subject. There real estate was devised upon trust for A. for life, and after A.'s decease, upon trust for his first and other sons successively in tail male, with remainders over; and the will contained a proviso, that if any person for the time being entitled to the possession of the estates should be under twenty-one, the trustees should receive the rents during the minority, and, after applying a competent part thereof to the maintenance of the minor, should invest and accumulate the surplus in their own names, and should stand possessed of the surplus and the accumulations upon trust to invest the same from time to time in the purchase of real estates, to be forthwith settled to the same uses and upon the same trusts as were thereby declared of the devised estates, or as near thereto as circumstances would admit; and the trusts for accumulation were declared void for remoteness. Now, Mr. Lewis does not, of course, deny that the clause of accumulation and investment of rents during minorities in Browne v. Stoughton would have been invalid in any settlement or will which did not limit estates tail to the objects of it; but he maintains, that as the will in that case did contain limitations in tail to the issue of the tenant for life, that circumstance furnishes a material distinction, so as to render valid a provision which without the estates tail would have been void. He reminds us of the established principle, that an executory limitation engrafted upon or in defeasance of an estate tail, is not within the mischief against which the rule as to perpetuities was designed to guard, and is consequently not invalidated by that rule, because of the power inherent in tenants in tail to bar any such ulterior limitation; and he tells us (and so far he is correct) that the circumstance of the estates tail being limited to unborn children, in which case the power of destroying the posterior or defeating limitations will remain in suspense until the estates tail vest by the birth of tenants in tail, and the exercise of it will remain still further in suspense until some tenant in tail becomes legally competent to execute assurances of land by attaining twenty-one, does not at all affect the general proposition, but the gift is sustained to precisely the same extent as a trust expectant on estates tail limited to persons in esse, and ascertained. He maintains, moreover, that there is no difference in this respect between limitations expectant upon, and powers or provisions collateral to, estates tail; and that where such powers or provisions would be destructible by the tenant in tail, if he were of age, immediately upon the vesting of the estate, his personal incapacity, when an infant, to destroy them will not be adverted to in resolving the question of their validity. Next he proceeds to contend that the particular clause of accumulation in Browne v. Stoughton was in substance an executory limitation, operating in partial defeasance of the interests of persons entitled under the preceding limitations; and that a disentailing assurance executed by any tenant in tail entitled under the will would have destroyed that clause.

Then, uniting these two arguments, "it is impossible," he says, "to contend for any distinction between the validity of such a clause and the validity of other powers and provisions in a settlement creating estates tail;" and here he instances the ordinary name and arms and other clauses. "Every one of those powers and provisions, although indefinite and unrestricted, is valid, so far as it is co-extensive with estates tail created under the settlement. The objects and purposes of these provisions are different; but no distinction in principle arises upon the object or purpose of the particular clause; for all of them are either illegal as being perpetuities, or legal as being destructible by the tenants in tail." Mr. Lewis then attempts to distinguish Browne v. Stoughton from two other important cases which had been previously decided with reference to this question, viz. Lord Southampton v. The Marquis of Hertford, (2 V. & B. 54), where the trust was secured by a legal term, and Marshall v. Holloway, (2 Swanst. 432), where it was annexed to the legal fee vested in trustees under the devise; but in both of which cases, as he tells us, the estate securing the trust, and also the trust of accumulation itself, preceded all the other limitations of the settlement, so that it was not within the direct power of tenants in tail, by suffering a recovery, to destroy the trust. Here we may remark in passing, that if, as Mr. Lewis allows, the trust of accumulation in Marshall v. Holloway was incapable of being barred by the tenants in tail, then for the same reason it was equally out of their power to affect it in Browne v. Stoughton; for there, too, it was attached to the legal estate devised to the trustees, which was limited in priority to all the other estates created by the will. Mr. Lewis, however, goes on further to argue, that the ground of the decision in Lord Southampton v. The Marquis of Hertford was, that the destination of the accumulated fund, which was there given to the first owner of the estate who should attain twenty-one, and to no other, was too remote, because the vesting of any interest in the fund was thereby suspended for an indefinite period; while in Browne v. Stoughton, on the contrary, the trust gave vested interests in the fund to those who took vested interests in the estate from the income of which it arose. The conclusions of the learned writer are summed up in the following terms:—"Just as a remote limitation or estate which is postponed to estates tail is on that account exempt from the rule against perpetuities, so a trust or direction for accumulation of rents limited to arise upon uncertain events, and of uncertain duration, is, when expectant upon, or limited in partial defeasance of, previous estates tail, legal and effectual, provided only the limitations of the fund to be produced by the accumulations (or, in other words, the destination of the fund) be not themselves open to objection, as involving a suspense in the vesting of the interests under those limitations for a period too remote. With regard to the rule against perpetuities, there is no distinction between accumulation of income and limitation of estates; and in those cases where a limitation of remote estates in the land would be legal, a direction for accumulating the rents of that land for a period indefinite is conceived to be equally so."

Now, if we look at the case of Turvin v. Newcome, we shall find that it cannot in substance be distinguished from Browne v. Stoughton; and that if Mr. Lewis's reasoning is good in the one case, it must equally prevail in the other. In that case lands were devised to trustees in fee, upon trust for one for life, and after his decease, for his first and other sons successively in tail; and the will contained a direction, that during the minority of any person taking any interest thereunder, the rents and profits of the land so vested in the minor should be laid out and invested by the trustees of the will by way of accumulation, and be held by them upon the same trusts as therein declared of the lands devised, or as near thereto as might be, or such of the same trusts as should still be subsisting. Sir W. P. Wood, V. C., held this trust for accumulation to be void. His Honor said—"It seems to me that this case has been determined by Browne v. Stoughton. Perhaps, however, it is somewhat less strong in one respect. In Browne v. Stoughton the legal estate was limited in strict settlement. Here the legal estate is vested in trustees." We think his Honor was in error when he stated that in the case of Browne v. Stoughton the legal estate was limited in strict settlement; because, according to all the reports, the legal estate in that case also was vested in trustees. But, however that may be, these few sentences contain a doctrine which is most important. They seem to shew, that, in the opinion of Sir W. P. Wood, V. C., it can make no difference upon the question of remoteness, in these sort of provisions for accumulation, whether they are annexed to the legal fee vested in trustees, or whether they are to be executed by persons having no estate in the lands, and therefore must be considered as simply collateral authorities, though coupled with and in the nature of trusts. This view entirely annihilates the whole proposition for which Mr. Lewis contends, viz. that the existence of estates tail in a settlement, which do not themselves infringe the rule against perpetuities, would always render valid a trust for accumulation, which but for the limitations in tail would be too remote, but is nevertheless merely co-extensive with those estates, and renders it unnecessary to consider whether such a trust, secured upon the legal fee devised to trustees, could in any case be destroyed by tenant in tail. For there can be no question that he would be capable of barring a mere collateral power, though in the nature of a trust, given to a stranger to the estate, whether called a trustee or not, for the accumulation of the surplus rents during the minority of any tenant in tail in possession, and for the benefit of that tenant in tail; and yet the inference to be drawn from the observations of the Vice-Chancellor is, that the trust would not be a whit the more valid on that account. However, his Honor proceeds to explain himself more fully. "It was argued," he says, "that all that is directed by this testator is that which the Court would direct the trustees to do during the minority of the parties who are entitled respectively to receive the rents and profits. They are to take what is called the surplus after the necessary allowances and payments, whatever they may be, and they are directed to invest it; and so far I accede to the argument, that, the property being rents, this would give absolute interests to those cestuis que trust who are interested as tenants in tail. It was then argued, that therefore the object and destination of the property, when accumulated, would fall within the limits assigned by law; and in that I do not follow the argument entirely. It is not so, because there is no doubt that here, although the accumulations during his time would belong to each successive tenant in tail, and would not go over from one tenant in tail to the next and the like, still the trust is declared to arise during every successive tenancy in tail, and in this respect it is the same as in Marshall v. Holloway and Lord Southampton v. The Marquis of Hertford. It is true that the destination of the money is not carried over from one tenant in tail to the next, as it was in those cases, until some tenant in tail attained majority; but there is a positive trust for accumulation fixed upon this property during the whole period while the successive cestuis que trust are under age; and it has been settled that this exceeds the limit which the law will permit for the duration of such a trust. The Vice-Chancellor, in Browne v. Stoughton, observed, that it did not, in his judgment, depend upon what the destination of the fund was, but upon the legality of the constitution of the trust; and the argument, that this is no more than what the Court would order, has been often used unsuccessfully." (And see upon this point the observations of the Lord Chancellor in Tench v. Cheese, 1 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 690) "It is quite true, that if no such provision as this had been made, the probable course of the Court would have been to direct the trustees to do that which they are directed to do by this will; but that would have been by the operation of the Court, acting upon the limitations which it finds in the will, for the benefit of the infants, whose estates would be properly limited; whereas here the testator himself affects to create the trust; and, following the case of Browne v. Stoughton, I must hold the trust so created to be void." The result of this judgment, then, establishes that no such provision for accumulation as above described—which, although the right to bar it exists in every successive tenant in tail, may nevertheless, by the successive minorities of those tenants, and their consequent incapacity to exercise that right, be by possibility protracted beyond the period of a life or lives in being and twenty-one years afterwards—can lawfully be created; and that, if the trust may last or arise beyond that time, the circumstance, that the destination of the fund when raised does not infringe the rule, must be altogether disregarded. The fallacy of the adverse doctrine lies in the assumption, that in a settlement creating estates tail there is no distinction between a trust for accumulation and other powers and provisoes, which, but for the right inherent in the estate of tenant in tail to defeat them by a disentailing assurance, would offend on the score of remoteness; and that all must alike fail as too distant, or be supported as capable of being so barred. Applied to most of the ordinary powers and provisoes in a settlement, by the exercise of which the tenant in tail, or his representative if he dies under age, is not deprived of any portion of the rents and profits of the estate to which he is entitled in possession, the remarks of Mr. Lewis would be just and sound. Such powers, though they may be unlimited as to time, yet, whenever the right to bar them resides in the owner of a preceding estate tail, follow the analogy of a shifting use, and are not invalidated, because the tenant in tail may be incapacitated from barring the entail, and so from preventing the exercise of the power until long after the legal limit. Lord St. Leonards, in maintaining the validity not only of the creation of unlimited powers of sale and exchange, where the estate is regularly limited in tail, but also of their exercise, if not destroyed, at any period, however remote, uses language almost identical with that which Mr. Lewis employs when speaking of trusts for accumulation; and Lord St. Leonards' language has lately been quoted and approved by the Master of the Rolls in the recent case of Wolley v. Jenkins, (see 3 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 323). But trusts for accumulation stand altogether apart. The exception which has been admitted with respect to other powers and provisoes has not in any case, so far as we are aware, been allowed to include them; and Turvin v. Newcome seems now to have decided, beyond all doubt, that the validity of a trust for accumulation contained in a deed or will creating a strict settlement, and which, in case of the death of successive tenants in tail under age and leaving issue, might possibly violate the rule against perpetuities, is not aided by the circumstance that it would be competent to any such tenant in tail, if of full age, to defeat the trust, or by the fact that this power, which is a legal right, is, in the case of a shifting use, considered, for this purpose, as in full force at the time when in reality it cannot be exercised. This case, however, does not decide, that whenever, at the time when the instrument of settlement comes into operation, a state of circumstances is possible in which a trust therein contained to raise a sum of money cannot be prevented from arising after the expiration of the absolute term limited by the perpetuity rule, the trust will be void in its creation. On the contrary, such a trust may be well created, even though the destination of the fund, when raised, is too remote; as in Tregonwell v. Sydenham, (3 Dow, 194), where a trust, which was secured by a term of sixty years limited to trustees subsequently to the estates tail, was, that the trustees should retain the rents, and apply them in the purchase of lands, to be conveyed as thereby directed; and after the execution of the trust, or expiration of the term, the estate was limited over. The trusts, so far as related to the application of the fund, being void for remoteness, it was held that a resulting trust arose for the heir-at-law. Here there was, therefore, no person beneficially entitled to an estate in the lands until the money was raised or the term expired; and of course there was no question as to the validity of the term to which the trust was attached. The true distinction, then, appears to be, that a trust of this last description need not be capable of operating to deprive the owner of an estate in possession in the lands (whether it be an equitable estate alone, or whether the legal and beneficial interests are united) of the full enjoyment of that estate at any time beyond the period of a life or lives in being and twenty-one years afterwards. In any case where it might by possibility so operate, it could not lawfully be created.

EQUITABLE ASSIGNMENT—UNAUTHORISED ACTS OF AGENT.

A JUDGMENT was delivered by the Lords Justices on the 25th April of considerable speculative importance to lawyers, but of still more vital and practical interest to the commercial world; speculatively important it is, as extending the doctrine of equitable assignment, and practically important, as seeming at least to decide that a principal cannot repudiate the unauthorised act of his agent. Wilfrid and Edwin Latham carried on business at Liverpool under the firm of Latham Brothers; they had branch establishments at other places, and among them at Buenos Ayres, where business was conducted under the name of W. & E. Latham; but it was proved that the establishments were in every respect the same; that they had a common balance-sheet; that the accounts of the house at Buenos Ayres were annually transmitted to Liverpool; and that such house was managed under a power of attorney given to Austin Latham, a clerk of the brothers, which was publicly lodged with a notary at Buenos Ayres; and that these facts were generally known there. In the beginning of May, 1855, five bills of exchange, at three months, drawn by W. & E. Latham on Latham Brothers, for sums amounting in all to 1200*l.*, were offered for sale at Buenos Ayres, by a broker, to the house of Renner, Delsar, & Imbert, the petitioners. Some distrust was shewn by the petitioners on seeing that the names of the drawers and drawees were the same; and thereupon the broker stated that the bills were good bills, and that he had got a promise that remittances should be made to them, but the nature of the remittances was not agreed on, nor was it promised that the remittance should be specified in any way. Under this assurance the bills were purchased by Renner & Co.; and on the 30th June five similar bills, at three months, amounting to 1000*l.*, were under similar circumstances offered for sale to, and purchased by, the petitioners. The first five bills were remitted to England, and duly accepted in June. On the 25th July, Latham Brothers stopped payment, and were adjudged bankrupts on the 7th August, but news of the stoppage did not arrive at Buenos Ayres until the 20th September. The second parcel of five bills arrived after the bankruptcy, and were refused acceptance. On the 1st August, when the first five bills were about falling due, a remittance of bills was made by W. & E. Latham to Latham Brothers, to the amount of 1471*l.* 15*s.*, accompanied by a letter containing the following passage:—"We beg to hand you inclosed firsts of exchange as follows," &c., "to our order, and indorsed to you, remitted specifically to meet the maturity of our drafts upon you, number," &c., (describing the first parcel of five bills). On the 1st September, after the bankruptcy, but before notice of the act of bankruptcy had arrived at Buenos Ayres, W. & E. Latham made another remittance, with a letter, from which the following is an extract:—"We beg to hand you inclosed first of exchange for 1000*l.*" (describing the bill) "indorsed to us, and by us to yourselves. This remittance we make to cover our drafts upon you for a like amount per mail of July, numbers" &c., (describing the second parcel of five bills). No notice was given to the petitioners of either of these remittances; both of them arrived after the bankruptcy, and were received by the assignees, and the petitioners claimed a specific lien on the bills remitted with the letters. On a petition of appeal from the decision of Mr. Commissioner Stevenson, the Lords Justices, in a reserved judgment, decided, that as to the first remittance, the petitioners were entitled to the lien which they claimed; and as to the second, they said they would require evidence of the law of Buenos Ayres before they would decide against the petitioners, and recommended a compromise.

It is the consequence and the principle of this decision which we desire to canvas. And, first, we are quite prepared to admit that had W. & E. Latham and Latham Brothers been distinct houses, and both bankrupt or insolvent, a long line of cases from Ex parte Waring[*] (19 Ves. 345) to Powles v. Hargreaves[†] (3 De G., Mac., & G. 430) would apply, and the lien, at least as to the first remittance, would have been well established. Again: if it had been agreed that a specific remittance should be made to cover a specific liability, there could have been no question as to the lien attaching on that specific remittance, if made before bankruptcy; (Ex parte Gledstanes[‡], 3 M., D., & De G. 109); and a similar effect might have been produced if notice had been sent to Renner & Co. by W. & E. Latham, stating that they (Lathams) were making such a remittance to Renner's credit and account, and in a manner declaring a trust for Renner & Co., (although even this is doubtful, considering the case of Ex parte Heywood[||], 2 Rose, 355). There would have been also little question, that if, while still solvent, the Liverpool house had assented to hold the bills, charged with the liability to Renner & Co., and had given notice to Renner & Co. that they did so, a good charge for the benefit of Renner & Co. would have been created by the transaction. Again: had the letters, instead of being addressed to Latham Brothers, been addressed to the acceptors of the bills remitted, announcing that the writers were indorsees of the bills, and that they desired the acceptors to pay Renner & Co. instead of themselves, this would have been equivalent to a qualified indorsement of the bills, and would have created a good equitable assignment of part of the debt due by the acceptor on the bills. But in the present case some one or other of those circumstances which have always hitherto been considered necessary for a good equitable assignment is absent, even in the case of the first remittance, and nearly all in the case of the second remittance. There is no notice to the creditor that a specific fund is charged with his debt, to which, of course, he must assent, to make the assignment good. There is no order by W. & E. Latham on their immediate debtor given to their creditor, which distinction was set up in the judgment in Rodick v. Gandell[*], (1 De G., Mac., & G. 763), as taking that case out of the rule in Burn v. Carvalho[†], (4 My. & C. 690). There are no equities between the houses of W. & E. Latham, and Latham Brothers, for they are the same, which distinguishes the cases on the rule in Ex parte Waring. There is no assent by the principals to the charge affected to be imposed on their property by their agents. There is, as between the agents and the petitioners, a general promise that remittances shall be made to meet their drafts, which is, in fact, nothing more than a promise to take up their bills at maturity, as they would have been bound to do in any case, and is a mere declaration that the bills were bonâ fide, and not mere fictitious paper; and there is, as between them and their principals, a mere mandate, which has hitherto been considered revocable by the mandator, or repudiable by the mandatory, and which it is admitted, even in the present case, would have been so but for the previous contract to remit. It is not, indeed, shewn how a contract between A. and B. to remit bills to C. for B.'s credit can prevent C. (who is no party to the contract) repudiating the remittance altogether; and yet this is necessary to support the judgment. For primâ facie the assignees of a bankrupt are trustees for the general creditors, and not (except under special circumstances, and for the benefit of the general creditors) in any case trustees for any one individual creditor. If, then, goods come to their hands which may be claimed in two different rights with equal justice, they are bound to prefer the claim which is most in favour of the general creditors. Now, suppose for a moment that there had been no bankruptcy, what course could be adopted by one repudiating a remittance like those mentioned? He must write back to Buenos Ayres, and send back the bills to the remittors. But in the present case the assignees are assignees for the remittors; therefore the only course open to them, on repudiating the charge, is to retain the bills for the general creditors; and this is what they have done. The contract to remit is indeed thereby broken; that, however, is a matter lying in contract, and damages for the breach, when liquidated, are properly proveable as a debt under the bankruptcy; but until the assent of the mandatory, in the absence of a specific contract binding the specific property, we submit there is no good assignment of that property, and such assent the assignees are by their office precluded from giving. They are bound to repudiate the charge, if repudiable, and to send back the bills to the mandators—that is, in the present case they are bound to hold the bills, being remitted to their elder title, to use an analogy drawn from the old law of real property.

[†] This case extends to insolvent estates the principle laid down in bankruptcy by Ex parte Waring.

[‡] B., S., & Co., of Calcutta, having consigned goods to G. B. in England, on which they had a lien for the price, write him word that they intend to draw in favour of G., K., & Co. for the balance of such shipments, and that they inclose bills of lading and policies of insurance for the goods in question; and they also draw a bill for the amount on G. B. in favour of G., K., & Co., which they direct G. B. to "place to account of shipments per Gardner." Before the goods reach England, G. B. becomes bankrupt, and the goods come to the possession of his assignees:—Held, that the above expressions in the bill and the letter amounted to a specific appropriation of the goods for the payment of the bill, and that the assignees were bound to account to G., K., & Co. for the proceeds.

[||] A. consigns a cargo to B., with a direction to pay to C. out of the proceeds a sum of money, and writes C. to that effect: C. has no lien on the proceeds.

[*] A railway company was indebted to A., their engineer, who was greatly indebted to his banker. The latter having pressed for payment or security, A., by letter to the solicitors of the company, authorised them to receive the money due to him from the railway company, and requested them to pay it to the banker. The solicitors, by letter, promised the banker to pay him such money on receiving it:—Held, that this did not amount to an equitable assignment of the debt.

[†] A., having goods in the hands of B. as his agent at a foreign port, and being under liabilities to C., by letter to C. promised that he would direct, and by a subsequent letter to B. did direct, B. to deliver over the goods to D. as the agent of C. at that port. Before the delivery of the goods a commission of bankruptcy issued against A., under an act of bankruptcy committed while his letter was on its way to B., and the goods were delivered by B. to D. in ignorance of the bankruptcy:—Held, that C. had a good title in equity to the goods.

Let us now look to the other side. It is proved by numberless cases, both at common law and in equity, that a trust imposed as to specific property for the benefit of creditors, who but for such trust would have had nothing more than a general personal right against the debtor, cannot be enforced by any one except the immediate parties to the trust instrument, and is revocable by the party creating the trust, unless the trustees have executed a binding declaration. It is sufficient to mention the old cases of Williams v. Everett[*], (14 East, 582); Gibson v. Minett[†], (2 Bing. 7); and Buchanan v. Findley[‡], (9 B. & Cr. 738), at common law; and Garrard v. Lord Lauderdale[§], (3 Sim. 1); Walwyn v. Coutts[||], (3 Mer. 707); and Scott v. Porcher[¶], (Id. 652), in equity. It is also clearly laid down in many cases, (among them Buchanan v. Findley), and it was not denied or doubted in the present case, that if the authority to the mandatory was revocable, it was revoked by the bankruptcy of the mandator. Thus, looking from the side of the remittee of the bills, we shew, that if the remittance could have been repudiated, it was, and must have been taken to be, repudiated by the assignees, owing to the bankruptcy of the remittees. Looking from the side of the remittors, we shew that if the mandate was revocable, it was revoked by the bankruptcy of the mandator. But the Lords Justices have decided that the lien still exists, which implies that the mandate was not revocable, and the remittance not repudiable; and the mandate was held to be made irrevocable by the prior general promise to provide assets to meet the bills; yet it was admitted that the general promise in itself only gave a general right of action. How, then, could it charge specific assets, which without it could not be charged? The mandate would charge specific assets, no doubt, as between the mandator and the mandatory. If the mandator were entitled to charge them, considering the relation between them, if the property were belonging to the mandator, he might desire the mandatory to hold it for a particular purpose, which the mandatory would be obliged, as against him, to fulfil, if he consented to hold the property, and not otherwise, so long as the order was not countermanded, but which he could not be compelled to fulfil as against any one else. But here the property belongs not to the mandator, but to the mandatory; and the judgment, therefore, not only rules that a person is precluded, by his prior general promise to remit assets, from revoking an order to you to apply your own property in a particular way, but it is also decided that you are compellable to hold your own property on a trust imposed upon it by the general promise of another person, made without any express authority from you. It seems, further, that the decision also incidentally overrules all the cases which declare, that in order to constitute a good equitable assignment, a specific fund must be specifically charged, by contract with the person for whose benefit the charge is made; foremost among which cases stands Watson v. *The Duke of Wellington, (1 Russ. & M. 602), and the cases which establish the rule, that for assigning a debt, it is not sufficient to give a power of attorney to some person to collect and pay the assignee, but that the order should be given to the debtor himself to pay the assignee—a rule established by the case of Rodick v. Gandell, before mentioned, and following out the principle of Garrard v. Lord Lauderdale, and that class of cases.

[*] K., residing abroad, having remitted bills on England to the defendants, his bankers in London, with directions in the letters inclosing such bills to pay the amount, in certain specified proportions, to the plaintiff and other creditors of K., who would produce their letters of advice from him on the subject, and desiring the amount paid to each person to be put on the back of their respective bills, and that every bill paid off should be cancelled; and the plaintiff having, before the bills became due, given notice to the defendants that he had received a letter from K. ordering payment of his debt out of that remittance, and having offered them an indemnity if they would hand over one of the bills to him, but the defendants having refused to indorse the bill away, or to act upon the letter, admitting, however, that they had received the directions to apply the money, and the defendants having, in fact, afterwards received the money on the bills when due—Held, that they did not, by the mere act of receiving the bills, and afterwards the produce of them with such directions, and without any assent on their part to the purport of the letter, and, still more, with their express dissent, bind themselves to the plaintiff so to apply the money in discharge of the debt due to him from K.; and consequently &c.; but that the property in the bills, and their produce, still continues in the remittee.

[†] The plaintiff directed the defendants, his bankers, "I request you to hold me 400*l.* from my private account, to the disposal of J. Mintern & Co." The order was presented to the bankers, who had also an account with Mintern & Co.; but Mintern & Co. not requiring the money, it was not paid to them, or passed to their account. The plaintiff revoked the order before it was paid or carried to Mintern's account; notwithstanding which revocation the defendants afterwards paid the money to Mintern & Co. A jury having found for the plaintiff, after a direction to consider whether the order was absolute or conditional, the Court refused a new trial.

[‡] A. & Co., merchants in Liverpool, remitted a bill to B. & Co. in London, with directions to get it discounted, and apply the proceeds in a particular way. B. & Co. did not get the bill discounted, but received the money when it became due. Before that time A. & Co. had stopped payment, and desired to have the bill returned. A commission of bankruptcy having been issued against them before the money was received on the bill by B. & Co.—Held, that the latter were liable to be sued for the amount by the assignees of A. & Co. for money had and received to their use; and that B. & Co. could not set off a debt due to them from A. & Co.

[§] A conveyance by a debtor to trustees for payment of scheduled creditors, who do not execute the deed, or conform to its terms, cannot be enforced by the creditors.

[||] Trust deed for payment of creditors, no creditor being a party, nor made by agreement, and without any consideration on the part of any creditor. The debtor afterwards executes other deeds, varying the trusts of the first. Motion for injunction by creditor to restrain the trustees from executing the trusts of the subsequent deeds till they had raised money to answer the first refused.

[¶] H. & Co. consigned pearls to B., with directions to sell, and pay the proceeds to P. (to whom H. & Co. were at the time indebted) on account. B. acknowledges the receipt of the consignment, and undertakes to perform the directions; but no notice is given by either party to P. H. & Co. subsequently write to B., requesting the pearls to be sent to America, and there disposed of; and afterwards, being insolvent, make an assignment of all their effects on trust for their creditors:—Held, that the directions accompanying the consignment did not constitute an appropriation, but amounted to no more than a mere mandate, revocable at the pleasure of the consignor, and which was actually revoked by the subsequent disposition of the property, &c.

But if this be so as to the first remittance, what shall be said of the second? There the remittance, which was the first attempt at a specific assignment, which was the first act that even physically designated the fund to be charged, was not made till after the bankruptcy—till after the property in the fund afterwards sought to be charged had passed to the assignees. We submit that the law laid down in Selkrigg v. Davies (2 Rose, 97, 291, 315, 316, 317) and Sill v. Worswick (1 H. Bl. 665) is not only binding on the Courts in this country, but is in strict conformity with the principles of general international law. The principle of those cases is, that each country will respect the bankrupt laws of its neighbour, and that bankruptcy in one country is an assignment of all the property belonging to the bankrupts, or which may come into the hands of the bankrupts, for their own use in another country. Now, such was exactly the case of the bills in question; they were bonâ fide indorsed to W. & E. Latham for their own use, and consequently they must have passed to the assignees under their bankruptcy. It is nothing to the point that if the Lathams had not been bankrupts they would have been morally bound to assign some bills to cover their drafts; there was nothing to designate those bills until they themselves designated them after the bankruptcy. If they had had notice of the bankruptcy, such designation would probably have been a fraudulent preference; the want of notice frees them, no doubt, from any charge of fraud, but in no respect compels their assignees to act in opposition to the trust imposed on them by their office for the benefit of the general creditors. Such a designation after bankruptcy is, in fact, a designation of another's goods to answer one's own debts, and it is submitted they can thereby no more bind their assignees in bankruptcy, than if, having indorsed the same bills for value, they should afterwards attempt to bind the indorsees by a declaration of trust. The assignees have acquired a title to the bills on another and an inconsistent trust, before any designation of the bills to answer the drafts.

Admitting, however, that foreign law could affect the rights of parties in a question of proof, it cannot do so in a question as to the existence of a lien. There is, without doubt, on questions of this kind, as on most others of international law, a conflict between the jurists; but to this extent all the jurists agree—that the conflict rests only between the lex fori and the lex domicilii debitoris, and that the "debitor" must be considered to be he against whose assets the lien is attempted to be enforced. (Story's Confl. Laws, 322 b—328, 423, 424). If he is a foreigner, there may be a question between the law of his domicil and that of the country in whose courts the right is tried; but in the case before us the "debitor" is English; the conflict is at rest, and the English law, it is submitted, must be the guiding rule.

[Stevens & Norton, 1857.]

Our legal literature at the present day is prolific of short treatises and essays. Manuals and hand-books abound upon almost every conceivable branch of theoretical and practical jurisprudence. They start up into existence like mushrooms, and perish with equal rapidity. Every fresh statute, each batch of orders, and every year's list of new cases, causes the burial and the birth of a multitude of ephemeral publications, purchased, skimmed, thrown aside, and entered in the catalogue of the second-hand bibliopole, in a much shorter time than it took to compose them. We are not disposed to discourage or deal harshly with these productions. They serve many useful ends. They may be carried about in the pocket; they can be read in trains, in cabs, by fits and starts, and at odd moments. They are not so deep as to require much thought, but are perused as a relaxation from the severer efforts of the mind. By their assistance the practitioner of long standing, who has too much business upon his hands to explore a bulky volume, with the arrangement of which he is unacquainted, is enabled conveniently to refresh the memory where it fails him, as by concentration of the mind for a lengthened period upon particular topics, to the exclusion of others, it will sometimes fail every man, and can grasp without trouble to himself the result of a mass of cases without wading into the shoreless sea of digests and reports. Thither, too, the student is often referred for the primary elements of the great science upon the study of which he is entering, and from thence imbibes his first ideas of law. These brief treatises for the most part emanate from comparatively young men. Just as the German student introduces himself to the notice of the classical public by bringing out a new edition of the Hecuba or Phormio, so with us—the juvenile lawyer endeavours to push forward in his profession by shewing that there is at least one subject to which he has paid particular attention.

---

* In order to constitute an equitable assignment, there must be an engagement to pay out of the particular fund.

These remarks have been suggested by Mr. Petgrave's work on the Law of Principal and Agent, which is now on our table; but they are not specially applicable to this little book. The author has evidently passed the limit of legal juvenility. He writes, as the Preface informs us, for the benefit of persons engaged in actual practice, and aspires to hit the happy medium between the diffuseness of Story and the brevity of Addison or Smith. Mr. Petgrave has been tolerably successful in his task, and has grouped his cases round his principles with considerable digestive skill and ingenuity of illustration. His principal merit consists in a quick comprehension of the bearing of an argument from the Bench, and of the extent of a judicial decision, and his references appear to have been generally well selected. Occasionally, too, he contrives to throw more light than is afforded by treatises of greater pretension upon some practical matters, a knowledge of which is essential to the correct understanding of the theory of the law, but requires no slight experience to attain. At the same time, the work is not free from imperfections. The definitions are sometimes too straggling, and the language deficient in that perspicuity which should be the main characteristic of all such publications. To take a couple of instances from the first chapter. In page 15 we have three successive definitions of a broker, all of which taken together no doubt embody an accurate description of his office, but of which each is severally imperfect. In page 4 Mr. Petgrave says—"One agent cannot, without committing a breach of faith, appoint another to do what he is himself directed to perform. . . . But an agent may do by the hands of another what it is in the scope of his authority to do; as, for instance, a parent who is an agent may direct a child to sign the parent's name on a bill of exchange." These sentences do not seem clearly to convey the author's meaning. They lead us to conclude that a parent who is an agent is authorised to direct his child to sign his name for him in all cases where it is within the scope of the parent's authority as agent to sign his name himself. But the proposition so broadly stated is not true. An agent may always do what is within his authority, but he may not indorse a bill by the hands of a third party, unless in the particular case he is either expressly or impliedly authorised so to do; and the case of Lord v. Hall, (19 L. J., C. P., 47), which Mr. Petgrave cites in support of his position, decided only that the question, whether an authority to indorse by the hands of a third party is included in an authority to indorse, is a question of fact to be determined by a jury. Again: in a subsequent chapter Mr. Petgrave lays down a proposition, to which he repeatedly refers, (pp. 153, 213, 228, 229), that "where a principal resides abroad, the whole credit is considered as subsisting between the immediate contracting parties." This is not law. As was shewn in our number of the 13th December, 1856, where the cases of Mahony v. Kekulé (14 C. B. 390) and Green v. Kopke, (18 C. B. 549), not noticed by Mr. Petgrave, were commented upon, and the whole subject investigated, "an agent entering into a contract for and on behalf of a foreign principal is not by any rule of law made necessarily personally liable upon such contract. The questions will be—First, did the agent enter into the contract in his own name, so that he might have been treated as the contracting party? Secondly, if he did, and if the principal was disclosed, was the credit given to the principal or to the agent? And these are questions of fact." There are other passages, though not very numerous, scattered throughout this volume, in which a similar inaccuracy or looseness of expression may be detected, but which we do not care to notice, as they are neither of much importance nor likely to mislead. We think, however, that by a little more care on Mr. Petgrave's part, these faults, trivial as they for the most part are, might have been altogether avoided. The typographical errors in the book are numerous, and indicate remissness in the drudgery, but necessary drudgery, of revision and correction during its progress through the press. Moreover, in the discussion of a doubtful question, or in pointing an analogy, where the author may be supposed to have become excited with the interest of the subject, his observations are in general very pertinent and forcible, and totally free from the vice of obscurity. In some places, however, he indulges in the objectionable practice of disfiguring the text with the names of cases, and occasionally analyses the cases themselves at unnecessary length. Results and contrast of results are what is required, and not analysis; and Smith v. Brown and Jones v. Robinson are sufficiently uninteresting in the notes. Equally do we desire to impress upon Mr. Petgrave, and upon all legal writers, that the index of cases should contain a list of all the reports in which each case is to be found. We presume that all are consulted by the writers themselves; for although material discrepancies are infrequent, yet as one report often supplies what another omits, it is not seldom that a comparison of all will alone bring out the real grounds of a judgment, or the full enunciation of a doctrine or a principle. In conclusion, we may increase by two recent cases the author's list of references. To those on the authority of the master of a ship to bind the registered owner (p. 113, note (l)) may be added the case of Myers v. Willis, (2 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 788); and upon the question how far a contract entered into by the master of a ship for the benefit of the owners, but unauthorised by them, is a contract in respect of which the owners can be sued in a court of equity, the case of Ashmall v. Wood (2 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 827; S. C., 3 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 232) contains some valuable information.

GENTLEMEN CALLED TO THE BAR.

Lincoln's Inn.—Edward Wood Stock, Esq., S. C. L.; Charles Seale Hayne, Esq.; Wiltshire Stanton Austin, Esq., B. A.; George Edward Martin, Esq., B. A.; George William Mounsey, Esq., M. BETTS'S PATENT BRANDY has ever since its introduction to the public been recognised, both by scientific men and the trade, as the best article ever manufactured in this country. Its claims to such pre-eminence are based upon its unrivalled purity, and its closer assimilation than any other to the flavour of the finest Champagne Brandy.

There has been no Brandy made from wine in France either in the present year or in the preceding one. Owing to the successive failures in their vintages, the French wine-grower gets a higher price for his wine, consumed as such, than he can realise by its being distilled into Brandy; and forasmuch as the Foreign Brandy of recent importations is but the product of British grain and beet-root spirits, the prestige hitherto exclusively enjoyed by French Brandy as having been distilled from a particular French wine no longer exists, and is no longer worthily assignable to it now that it is bunglingly made from other materials. The supply of wine for distillation into Brandy having failed, the French distiller is constrained to recur to a manufacture in which he needs the quarter of a century's experience which has been exercised upon that of BETTS'S PATENT BRANDY, to render his article respectably competitive, and he has not had it. Under these circumstances the Messrs. BETTS challenge that their PATENT BRANDY is superior to any now made abroad.

It is to the interest of the public and the Messrs. Betts that these facts should be widely spread, for recent importations are of a quality so inferior as to disgrace the name they bear, and are twice the price of BETTS'S PATENT BRANDY, which is supplied by the trade to private families in any quantity, down to the single capsuled bottle. Excise regulations prevent its sale from the DISTILLERY, 7, SMITHFIELD-BARS, ST. JOHN-STREET, in any less quantity than two gallons.

CAUTION.—TO TRADESMEN, MERCHANTS, SHIPPERS, OUTFITTERS, &c.

WHEREAS it has lately come to my knowledge that some unprincipled person or persons have for some time past been imposing upon the public, by selling to the Trade and others a spurious article under the name of BOND'S PERMANENT MARKING INK; this is to give Notice, that I am the original and sole Proprietor and Manufacturer of the said Article, and do not employ any traveller, or authorise any persons to represent themselves as coming from my establishment, for the purpose of selling the said Ink. This Caution is published by me to prevent further imposition upon the public, and serious injury to myself.

E. R. BOND, Sole Executrix and Widow of the late John Bond, 28, Long-lane, West Smithfield, London.

 To avoid disappointment from the substitution of counterfeits, be careful to ask for the genuine Bond's Permanent Marking Ink; and further to distinguish it, observe that NO SIXPENNY SIZE is or has at any time been prepared by him, the Inventor and Proprietor.

 Orders for THE JURIST given to any Newsman, or letter (post-paid) sent to the Office, No. 3, CHANCERY LANE, or to STEVENS & NORTON, 26, BELL YARD, LINCOLN'S INN, will insure its punctual delivery in London, or its being forwarded on the evening of publication, through the medium of the Post Office, to the Country.

Printed by HENRY HANSARD, at his Printing Office, in Parker Street, in the Parish of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, in the County of Middlesex; and Published at No. 3, CHANCERY LANE, in the Parish of St. Dunstan in the West, in the City of London, by HENRY SWEET, residing at No. 34, Porchester Terrace, Bayswater, in the County of Middlesex.—Saturday, May 9, 1857.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, MAY 16, 1857.

THE question, how far the liability of sureties is affected by a change in the status of their principal, has been considered by our Courts on several recent occasions. The circumstances under which it has generally arisen have been, that the sureties have become bound for the acts of their principal while he was filling a certain office, and that afterwards a statute has been passed altering the tenure or the duties of his office. In all these cases the continuing liability or non-liability of the sureties must be determined by reference to the contract into which they have entered. While, on the one hand, where the risk is increased in a manner which they never contemplated, they may well say, "non hæc in fœdera veni;" yet, on the other, it is perfectly competent for them to bind themselves beyond the limits of the office filled by their principal at the time of their obligation being incurred, and they cannot claim to be discharged merely by reason of a change in the duration or the duties of such office. The principal authority upon this subject is Oswald v. The Mayor of Berwick-upon-Tweed, (5 H. L. C. 586; 2 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 743), which was decided last year in the House of Lords. The facts were these:—In 1842 David Murray had been appointed treasurer to the borough of Berwick. This was under a resolution of the mayor and corporation, declaring what were his duties, that he should find sureties in 2000*l.*, and "should be appointed for the remainder of the year ending the 9th November next, if it should so long please the council, but not otherwise." Upon his appointment he and his sureties gave to the corporation a bond, which recited the appointment of Murray as treasurer for the remainder of the year ending the 9th November, 1842, if it should so long please the council, but not otherwise. It was then provided that the sureties should be bound for Murray during the whole time of his continuing in office in consequence of the said election, "or under any annual or other future election" of the said council to the said office. At the time when this bond was executed the office of treasurer was an annual office, to which, under the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 58, the council was in every year to appoint; but in August, 1843, while Murray was still holding the office, another statute (the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 89) came into operation, which directed the council in future to appoint to such office during pleasure. Murray was re-elected under this new law, and the first question was, whether this was a "future election to the office" within the meaning of the bond, so as to render the sureties liable for a subsequent default of their principal. This question was answered in the affirmative. "It is certain," said Alderson, B., delivering the opinion of the judges, "that the sureties meant not to limit their responsibility to the first election, for they agree to be bound 'if David Murray continues in the said office under any annual or other future election.' What do these words mean? In the first place, they mean that he must continue in the said office; and this restrains the liability, not merely by the continuity, but also by the identity of the office. Its duties, therefore, primâ facie must not be changed, its liabilities and checks must not be varied, nor even its duration or tenure altered. But then this last, it is said, is specially provided for by the other words, 'annual or other future election;' for the natural meaning of these words is, 'any future election, whether annual or other than annual.' If so, the bond contains a declaration that the sureties will be liable, though the duration or tenure of the office may be changed, and although the appointment may cease to be annual. And, in truth, that change entails all the consequences which necessarily follow it, even as to the change of liabilities, if any there be; for if the change of the duration is contemplated, and the mere change of duration necessarily varies the liability to account, that alteration of the liability to account must be considered as also contemplated." In answer to an argument that the bond should be construed as containing a recital that the future appointment must be made according to the law which was in force when the bond was given, the learned judges said—"The reason for referring to the recitals in a deed is, because, from the circumstances and facts there stated, the parties themselves have plainly expressed their intention; and consequently, in accordance with that expressed and specified intention, the Courts construe and modify the more general words of their covenant. But it is somewhat strange to propose that the Courts should construe their covenant by what must be at most an implied recital suggested by the counsel, and that where there is no express recital on this subject at all; and therefore we can only in the present case construe the words of the covenant without any such light being thrown upon them."

To the same effect is the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in The Mayor, &c. of Dartmouth Hardness v. Silly, (26 L. J., Q. B., 90). There the facts were precisely similar to those of the preceding case, as to the nature and change of the office, but the bond contained a recital that the treasurer of the borough had been appointed under the stat. 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, and its condition was, that he should at all times account for and apply all monies in his hand as treasurer (whether by virtue of his present or any subsequent appointment to the said office) according to the direction and intent of the said statute, and in every other respect act in conformance with the same, "and all other laws and regulations now or hereafter to be in force touching the said office of treasurer, or the person or persons performing, or liable to perform, the duties thereof." It was held that the sureties were liable for a breach of duty by the treasurer, under an appointment during pleasure, by virtue of the stat. 6 & 7 Vict. c. 89. Lord Campbell, C. J., delivering the judgment of the Court, said, "Unless there be words in the condition of the bond to continue the obligation after such a change in the tenure of the office, there can be no doubt that it would be extinguished both as to principal and sureties. The condition recites that the appointment to the office of treasurer was under the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, and without any such recital parties to such a bond are always supposed to contract according to the existing state of the law, and in the belief that the law will continue unchanged, if they make no provision for the contingency of a change in the law. But, as observed by Maule, J., in Oswald v. The Mayor of Berwick, 'there is nothing to prevent parties, if they choose by apt words to express an intention so to do, from binding themselves by a contract as to any future state of the law. Supposing that the parties to this bond had contemplated that some alterations might be made by law in the office of treasurer, there would have been nothing illegal in the sureties binding themselves to be answerable, though the nature and tenure and duties of the office were changed.' Now, looking to the whole of the condition of the present bond, we think that it is framed with this view, and that it contains language more potent for this purpose than any to be found in the instrument adjudicated upon in Oswald v. The Mayor of Berwick." In Pybus v. Gibb and Others (3 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 315; 26 L. J., Q. B., 41) the condition of a bond recited that a bailiff of a county court had been appointed under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, and stipulated for the proper execution by him of all warrants issued out of the said court to the high bailiff, and for his due performance of the office of bailiff, and for his not taking any fees except those specified in that act. Statutes were afterwards passed increasing the jurisdiction of the county court in point of amount, giving it jurisdiction in matters of insolvency and over absconding debtors, and enabling any one of the bailiffs authorised by the judge to sell goods seized in execution without the intervention of a sworn broker. The Court of Queen's Bench held, that by these statutes the duties and liabilities of the office were essentially changed, and the risk of the sureties increased, and that consequently they were discharged, although the breach of duty relied on arose entirely out of the original duties of the office. It was argued, that as the breach which actually occurred would have been a breach before any new duties were imposed, the sureties were still liable pro tanto, and that the bond remained as a bond applicable to the old duties. But the Court held that such a severance could not be made, both upon principle and on the authority of Bonar v. Macdonald, (3 H. L. C. 226). Coleridge, J., said, "The liability of the sureties is increased as to the old duties by the fact of new duties being cast upon the principal; and in common sense this must be so. A prudent man would not consider it the same thing to be surety for a person who has to perform duties imposing a slight pecuniary responsibility, and for one whose duties involved greater pecuniary responsibility. In all those cases the solvency of the principal is a material element. I may be willing to guarantee the performance of his duties by the bailiff of a court which is limited to the recovery of debts under 20*l.*; but if I were told that he was also to discharge duties relating to a court of bankruptcy, or of a court of unlimited jurisdiction, I might be very unwilling to execute the bond." Wightman, J., said, "It may be taken as a principle of law, that a bond by a surety, conditioned for the due performance by his principal of the duties of an office, is rendered null if the office or its duties are so altered as in any degree to increase or vary the risk of the surety to his possible disadvantage. . . . The bailiff might be very competent, in the opinion of the sureties, to execute the duties of the office of bailiff of the limited jurisdiction, but not if other important duties are cast upon him." Upon similar grounds sureties were held to be discharged in the late case of Badger v. Finch[*]. They had entered into a bond for the due discharge by an income-tax collector of the duties of his office. The bond recited that he had been appointed collector of the property, income, and assessed taxes which had been or thereafter should be charged or assessed within a certain parish "under and by virtue of the several acts relating to the said duties." By a subsequent act the income tax was raised 2*d.* in the pound. The Court held that the new act increased the risk, and that the condition of the bond contemplated only the collection of money under the statutes which were in existence at the time when the bond was given.

[*] Q. B., April 24, 1857.

MR. KERR'S EDITION OF BLACKSTONE.

Our attention has been directed to some coincidences or resemblances, designed or undesigned, between certain of the notes in Mr. Kerr's edition of Blackstone's Commentaries and the notes in the edition of Chitty's Blackstone by Messrs. Hargrave, Sweet, Couch, and Welsby; and we have been asked to characterise the method of "editing" which has resulted in the phenomena in question. We decline to do that, but we print below some samples of the coincidences or resemblances to which we have been referred, and leave them to the consideration of those who may feel an interest in the matter. We may add that some of the parallel passages to which we have been referred are the substance of notes contained in Christian's or Coleridge's edition, reprinted fairly, with the author's name suffixed in every instance, in the twenty-first edition, but appropriated by Mr. Kerr without any acknowledgment; and these are notes, not drily stating statutory changes in the law subsequent to the date of the Commentaries, but being merely ornamental or unnecessary additions to the text. For instance, at p. 137 of the first volume, Mr. Hargrave borrowed and acknowledged a note from Christian thus:—

"(14). It is said that exile was first introduced as a punishment by the Legislature in the thirty-ninth year of Elizabeth, when a statute enacted that 'such rogues as were dangerous to the superior people should be banished the realm;' (39 Eliz. c. 4; see Barr. Ant. Stat. 260); and that the first statute in which the word 'transportation' is used is the 18 Car. 2, c. 3, which gives a power to the judges, at their discretion, either to execute or transport to America for life the moss-troopers of Cumberland and Northumberland, (2 Woodd. 498), a law which very unnecessarily was continued till the 31 Geo. 2, c. 42, and then made perpetual.—[Christian.]"

In the original note Mr. Christian of course acknowledged his obligations to Barrington and Wooddeson, and Mr. Hargrave, in reprinting it, carefully referred it to its author. Not so Mr. Kerr, who drops the "on dit," and tells us positively, from his own inspiration, that "exile was first introduced as a punishment in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when it was enacted that 'such rogues as were dangerous to the superior people should be banished the realm.' (39 Eliz. c. 4). The first statute in which the word 'transportation' is used is the 18 Car. 2, c. 3, which gives a power to the judges, at their discretion, either to execute or transport to America for life moss-troopers of Cumberland and Northumberland."

For another instance, too long for quotation, see Mr. Justice Coleridge's note (borrowed and acknowledged by Mr. Hargrave, and borrowed and not acknowledged by Mr. Kerr) on the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. (1 Bl. 136).

At p. 143, in a note to the reference by Blackstone to the act of 13 Car. 2, st. 1, c. 5, against tumultuous petitioning, Mr. Chitty says—"The punishment for an offence against the act is a fine to any amount not exceeding 100*l.* and imprisonment for three months. At the trial of Lord George Gordon the whole Court, including Lord Mansfield, declared that this statute was not affected by the Bill of Rights, 1 Will. & M. st. 2, c. 2; (see Dougl. 571); but Mr. Dunning, in the House of Commons, contended 'that it was a clear and fundamental point in the constitution of this country that the people had a right to petition their representatives in Parliament, and that it was by no means true that the number of names signed to any such petition was limited. To argue that the act of Charles was now in force would be as absurd as to pretend that the prerogative of the Crown still remained in its full extent, notwithstanding the declaration in the Bill of Rights.' (See New Ann. Reg., 1781, vol. 2)." This note Mr. Kerr repeats verbatim as his own.

At p. 163, Mr. Hargrave has a long note commencing thus:—"In the late case of Stockdale v. Hansard (7 Car. & P. 737; 9 Ad. & El. 1; 11 Ad. & El. 253) the extent to which the Courts of justice can take cognisance of, and even control, the privileges claimed by the House of Commons, has undergone much discussion. The circumstances of that case were briefly as follows: —The House of Commons ordered a certain report to be printed, containing matter reflecting upon Stockdale, which if printed by any private person would have been a libel," &c. Mr. Kerr's "own" note in the same place begins thus, and bears throughout an equal resemblance to that of his predecessor:—"In the case of Stockdale v. Hansard (7 Car. & P. 737; 9 Ad. & El. 1; 11 Ad. & El. 253) the extent to which the Courts of justice can take cognisance of the privileges of the House of Commons was much discussed. The House of Commons had ordered a certain report to be printed, containing matter reflecting upon Stockdale, which if printed by a private person would have been a libel," &c.

At p. 248, Mr. Hargrave says—"On the aberration of mind of George III, his son, the Prince of Wales, (afterwards George IV), was declared regent by express act of Parliament, (51 Geo. 3, c. 1), but with certain restrictions, which in the following year were removed by the 52 Geo. 3, c. 8. By the 1 Will. 4, c. 2, the present Duchess of Kent was appointed the guardian of her daughter (her present Majesty) until she attained the age of eighteen years; and it was also declared that the duchess should be the regent during the Queen's minority; but her Majesty having attained the age of eighteen years before the death of William IV, no regency took place. Lastly, by the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 52, his Royal Highness Prince Albert," &c. This is given by Mr. Kerr verbatim (except in the substitution of "finally" for "lastly") as his own.

At p. 269, Mr. Hargrave says—"That the prerogative of mercy should be lodged in the Crown does not seem to be owing to the legal fiction that the king is the injured party, but rather to the necessity of placing the power of forgiveness where it may be promptly and judiciously exercised. . . . . The executive has, therefore, in all countries, naturally and necessarily been invested with this prerogative. (See 2 Inst. 233; Show. 1, 284; Ld. Raym. 214; 2 T. R. 569)."

Mr. Kerr's note runs thus:—"The prerogative of mercy would seem to be lodged in the Crown, not so much from the legal fiction that the sovereign is the injured party, as from the necessity of placing it," &c., as above.

At p. 272, Mr. Hargrave, after stating the effect (not the words) of the provisions in the stat. 31 Hen. 8, c. 8, relating to the king's proclamations, cites Burnet's remark, that "it was upon this act all the great changes in the national religion made during the minority of Edward VI were grounded." Mr. Kerr, in the same place, happens to state the effect of the proviso in the same words, and also remarks, not after Burnet, but originally, that "upon this statute were founded all the changes in the national religion made during the minority of Edward VI."

At p. 343, Mr. Hargrave says, "Before summoning the Long Parliament, Charles I appointed seven of the leading patriots sheriffs by prerogative, in order to prevent their being returned to Parliament." At the same place Mr. Kerr says the same thing in the same words, omitting "by prerogative."

In vol. 2, at p. 32, Mr. Sweet says, "In like manner are the lands belonging to the numerous alien priories and abbeys dissolved in 1415 by the stat. 2 Hen. 5 liable to tithes. (See 2 J. & W. 528, 534). But the lands of the lesser monasteries, which were surrendered after the 27 Hen. 8, and of the Knights of St. John, given to the king by the stat. 32 Hen. 8, c. 24, are within the 31 Hen. 8, c. 13, s. 21. (1 Y. & C. 19; 6 Bac. Ab. 756)." Mr. Kerr knows all about it without the help of books, and says, "In like manner the lands belonging to the numerous alien priories and abbeys dissolved in 1415 by the stat. 2 Hen. 5 remained liable to tithes. But the lands of the lesser monasteries, surrendered after the 27 Hen. 8, c. 28, and of the Knights of St. John, given to the king by the stat. 32 Hen. 8, c. 24, are within the meaning of the stat. 31 Hen. 8, c. 13."

At p. 283, Mr. Sweet copies a note on waste, by Christian, and appends Christian's name to it; but in the note he has interpolated references to 2 Swanst. 149, n.; Hargr. Co. Litt. 220; 16 Ves. 185; Jac. 71; and 6 Sim. 497. Mr. Kerr gives the note, with the same references, as Christian's, and does not cite the decisions subsequent to the publication of Mr. Sweet's note. Several other notes by Christian, with additions by Mr. Sweet, appear in Mr. Kerr's book with the same additions. But, though our materials are far from being exhausted, we and our readers have had "somewhat too much of this."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

PARLIAMENTARY.

A SELECT committee has been appointed to consider whether the privilege conferred on reports of legal proceedings should not be extended to reports of the proceedings in Parliament and other public assemblies.

A select committee has also been appointed to inquire into the expediency of changing the mode in which witnesses are sworn to give evidence before committees of the House of Lords.

Government is about to introduce a bill that will afford greater precautions against wilful and accidental poisoning.

The Lord Chancellor's bill relating to probate and letters of administration, and his bill relating to marriages and divorce, have been read the first time. They differ from the bills introduced by him last session in two respects—the Court of Probate is to be separated not only from the Court of Chancery, but also from every judge of the Court of Chancery; and the clause giving a legal sanction to mutual agreements for the separation of husband and wife has been struck out from the divorce bill.

EXAMINATIONS AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

EASTER TERM, 1857.

AT the examination of candidates for admission on the roll of attornies and solicitors of the superior courts, the examiners recommended as deserving of equal honorary distinction the following gentlemen:—

Henry Kirke Hebb, of Lincoln, who served his clerkship to Mr. Joseph Moore, of Lincoln, and Messrs. Scott, Tahourdin, & Shaw, of Lincoln's-inn-fields.

Walter Bullar Ross, of Ipswich, who served his clerkship to Mr. Simon Batley Jackaman, of Ipswich, and Messrs. Aldridge & Bromley, of South-square, Gray's-inn.

William Henry Walsh, of Oxford, who served his clerkship to Mr. William Sale, of Manchester, and Messrs. Pownall, Son, & Cross, of Staple-inn, Holborn.

The Council of the Incorporated Law Society have accordingly awarded a prize of books to be presented to each of those candidates.

The examiners have also certified that the following candidates passed examinations very little inferior to those who have been reported for prizes:—

1. Henry William Bradford, of Westmeon, Hampshire, who served his clerkship to Mr. James Templer, of Bridport, and Messrs. Clowes, Son, & Hickley, of King's Bench-walk, Temple.

2. Henry William Bainton, of Beverley, Yorkshire, who served his clerkship to Mr. James Baker Bainton, of Beverley, and Mr. John England, of Beverley and Hull, and Mr. James Sidney Hargrove, of Lincoln's-inn-fields; and Thomas Berridge, of Melton Mowbray, who served his clerkship to Mr. Sommersby Edwards, of Long Buckby, and Mr. George Capes, of Field-court, Gray's-inn.

3. John Latham Press, of Hingham, Norfolk, who served his clerkship to Mr. Edward Palmer Clarke, of Wymondham, and Mr. John White, of Barge-yard-chambers, Bucklersbury.

By order of the Council,
ROBERT MAUGHAM, Secretary.

The transportation and penal servitude bill has been read a second time. It proposes to abolish altogether sentences of transportation, but to empower the Government to send out of this country convicts sentenced to penal servitude after they have undergone a preliminary portion of their punishment in separate imprisonment and in associated labour. Sentences of penal servitude are to be co-extensive in duration with those sentences of transportation for which they are substituted, and they may also be for periods below seven years, the minimum period of transportation. The bill leaves untouched the law relating to tickets of leave.

CAUTION.—TO TRADESMEN, MERCHANTS, SHIPPERS, OUTFITTERS, &c.

WHEREAS it has lately come to my knowledge that some unprincipled person or persons have for some time past been imposing upon the public, by selling to the Trade and others a spurious article under the name of BOND'S PERMANENT MARKING INK; this is to give Notice, that I am the original and sole Proprietor and Manufacturer of the said Article, and do not employ any traveller, or authorise any persons to represent themselves as coming from my establishment, for the purpose of selling the said Ink. This Caution is published by me to prevent further imposition upon the public, and serious injury to myself.

E. R. BOND, Sole Executrix and Widow of the late John Bond, 28, Long-lane, West Smithfield, London.

⁎ To avoid disappointment from the substitution of counterfeits, be careful to ask for the genuine Bond's Permanent Marking Ink; and further to distinguish it, observe that NO SIXPENNY SIZE is or has at any time been prepared by him, the Inventor and Proprietor.

⁎ Orders for THE JURIST given to any Newsman, or letter (post-paid) sent to the Office, No. 3, CHANCERY LANE, or to STEVENS & NORTON, 26, BELL YARD, LINCOLN'S INN, will insure its punctual delivery in London, or its being forwarded on the evening of publication, through the medium of the Post Office, to the Country.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, MAY 23, 1857.

THERE is no head of equity jurisprudence of perhaps greater importance than that which compels a person actually to do that which he has contracted and is consequently morally bound to do, thereby correcting the deficiency of the common law, according to which it is optional with a person who has entered into a contract whether he will perform it or not, if he be willing to stand the risk of being compelled to pay damages for its non-performance—a remedy which in many cases is necessarily very inadequate.

In a recent case the Court appears to have been rather inclined to contract the jurisdiction of equity, as we think, without sufficient reason, and to leave parties to the inadequate remedies of common law. The case alluded to is that of Clayton v. Illingworth, (10 Hare, 451). There the plaintiff entered into an agreement with the defendant's agent to take a messuage and thirty-eight acres of land, at the rent of 80*l.*, payable half-yearly, and to abide by the agreement in all respects as entered into by B., the late tenant; the tenant to be at the expense of an agreement for letting; not to sell off hay, &c.; the said tenant to satisfy the defendant that he was a person qualified and capable of managing the farm, and in other respects a likely tenant, or the memorandum to become void.

It does not appear from the report that the defendant had objected to the plaintiff as a person not qualified or capable of managing the farm, so as to render the memorandum void under the last clause contained in it. Sir W. P. Wood, V. C., observed that "the agreement expressed no term during which the tenancy was to continue, and inquired whether there was any authority to shew that the Court would interpose to enforce the specific performance of an agreement for letting from year to year." It was argued by counsel for the plaintiff that a tenancy, commenced from year to year, frequently endured, by the mutual consent of the parties, for a long period, and it was therefore material that its terms should be carefully defined at the commencement: that this was provided for by the agreement, which stipulated that the formal instrument should be paid for by the tenant—a stipulation which necessarily implied that such an instrument must be executed by the tenant; and this execution it was the object of the suit to enforce—a relief which could not be obtained at law. His Honor, however, said "that he was not aware it was usual to have a lease under seal in the case of a yearly tenancy, and the reference to an agreement to be paid for by the tenant might be explained by the fact, that the present agreement was made with the agent of the lessor, and not with the lessor himself. Equity interposed to compel specific performance in cases where the legal remedy was inadequate; but in this case he did not see why the remedy at law would not be sufficient. An action might be brought upon the agreement, and the full terms of the agreement could be shewn by proving the former agreement with B., to which it referred, thereby importing that agreement into the agreement before the Court. In the absence of any authority for the interference of the Court in such a case, he must dismiss the claim."

Now, in the first place, the case seems to be in direct opposition to the case of Fenner v. Hepburn, (2 Y. & C. C. C. 159), where there was a memorandum of agreement very similar to that in the case now in question, except that the term for which the premises were agreed to be taken was for sixteen years; and it was there laid down by Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, L. J., (then Vice-Chancellor), that "whether the memorandum was or was not a present assignment, yet if it appeared from the agreement that a further instrument was necessary to carry the intention of the parties into effect, a Court of equity would not refuse relief to a party seeking its aid in that respect."

Now, in Clayton v. Illingworth, with great deference to the learned judge who decided it, we think that the clause, by which it was stipulated that the tenant was "to be at the expense of an agreement for letting," shews conclusively that the parties contemplated a further agreement, into which was to be imported the agreement of the former tenant; and as that agreement would almost necessarily not be in the possession of the plaintiff, his right to have discovery of it, and to have his agreement with the defendant made complete, by incorporating in it the former agreement, without leaving him to the uncertainty of obtaining discovery or production at law, ought of itself alone, we think, to have been a sufficient reason for granting him relief.

But another important question arises—was it intended by the learned judge to lay down as a general rule, that a Court of equity ought not to compel specific performance of an agreement to grant a tenancy from year to year? If so, it seems difficult to perceive upon what grounds his decision can be reconciled with the principles upon which the Court professes to act in questions arising under this peculiar head of its jurisdiction. Now, the mere absence of any authority to shew that the Court has interposed to enforce specific performance of an agreement for letting from year to year is no valid reason for refusing relief, if the principles upon which it ordinarily acts in such cases are applicable, any more than it would be if the Court were to refuse to decree specific performance of an agreement for a lease for twenty-two years and a half, merely because a case could not be found in which specific performance had been decreed of an agreement to let land for precisely that period. If it had been an agreement to let the farm for two or three years, would not the Court have compelled specific performance? And if so, why not for a year? Where is the line to be drawn? Is the Court to refuse to interpose to compel specific performance of an agreement to grant a lease for a year, a year and a half, a year and three quarters, but enforce it when it exceeds that or some other period? It is clear, that if there were a mere agreement for a tenancy at will, it would be futile for the Court to interfere, as the tenancy might be instantly determined; but this reason is not applicable where there is an agreement for a term, however short.

As tenancies from year to year are very numerous throughout this country, the decision is of much more importance than it might at first sight appear to be: it in effect gives a landed proprietor the option of saying to a person to whom he has let a farm from year to year, "Get what damages you can at law: I will not do what I have agreed to do." Lord Coke, wedded as he naturally was to the common law, and thinking it the perfection of reason, thought damages an adequate remedy for non-performance of a covenant to grant a lease; and in the case of Bromage v. Genning (1 Roll. Rep. 354, 368) he said, that "without doubt a Court of equity ought not to enforce the making of a lease; for if it might, to what purpose was the action upon the case, or of covenant? That to do so would subvert the intent of the covenantor, who meant to have an election either to pay damages or make a lease; whereas this was to compel him to make a lease against his will." The decision in that case had no effect in staying the jurisdiction in equity; and the reasons for it were characterised by Lord Erskine, when Chancellor, to be "the most untenable, preposterous, and unjust." (See Halsey v. Grant, 13 Ves. 76). And certainly it does seem to be repugnant to natural justice and common sense, in any case where a person may have either contracted to sell, lease, or deliver up specific property of any kind, that he should have the option, or that it should be presumed that he intended, when he entered into the contract, to retain the option, of annulling it upon payment of damages, if recovered against him in a court of law.

To say that the remedy at law is sufficient appears to be begging the whole question. Suppose, for instance, a tenant, about to leave a large farm, agrees to take another farm as tenant from year to year, and the landlord refuses to perform the agreement, the consequence is, that the tenant, not being able to take another, is compelled to sell all his stock, perhaps of a kind not admitting of valuation, and to which the pretium affectio is applicable, can it be said that it is right to leave him to the mere legal remedy of obtaining damages from a jury, rather than that the Court of Chancery should give him the very thing which he contracted for?

It seems to us, in the case in question, that certainly, so long as the tenancy from year to year continued undetermined by a valid notice to quit, the tenant was entitled to a decree for specific performance; nor ought he to have been disentitled to relief even by the determination of the tenancy by notice or otherwise, (inasmuch as he had contracted for a further agreement), if the neglect or the refusal of the landlord to execute it might throw obstacles in his way in an application for damages at law.

THE case of Bremer v. Freeman and Another, decided by the Judicial Committee of Privy Council on the 9th inst., involves several interesting points on the conflict of international law. The question was, whether a will made by a Madame Calcraft or Allegri was valid. This depended upon two other questions, whether she was domiciled in France at the time of her death; and if so, whether her will, made there according to the English law, could be supported? The testatrix was the daughter of an officer in the East India Company's service, and was born in the East Indies in 1795. She had, therefore, an Anglo-Indian domicil of origin. General Calcraft, her father, returned to England, with her and her sister and mother, in 1806. The deceased resided with him as part of his family until 1825, and her domicil then was English. About that time she left her father and travelled abroad, and went into Italy. Her father died in 1834, and her sister then joined her, and travelled also in Italy until 1838, when both sisters removed to Paris, and lived together in lodgings until the death of the sister in September, 1840. She renewed from time to time the lease of her apartments for short terms of years, furnished them herself, and died in them in 1853, without ever having quitted Paris. She had declared on several occasions that she would never return to England, and that she wished to be buried near her sister in the cemetery of Père la Chaise. It was alleged that she had been secretly married while in Italy, but the proof of this was held to be too slight to raise any question of her having acquired the domicil of her husband. The Court held, under these circumstances, that the testatrix was domiciled at Paris at the time of her death, and that, in opposition to the above facts, it was of little weight that her fortune was invested chiefly in the English funds, that her will was made in the English form, and that she had not procured an authorisation from the French Government to fix her domicil in France, according to article 13 of the Code Civil, whereby it is declared that "the foreigner who shall have been admitted by authorisation of the Emperor to establish his domicil in France shall enjoy there all civil rights, so long as he shall continue to reside there." The Court held, that, for the purpose of having a domicil which would regulate succession, it was not necessary to have any authorisation of the Emperor.

It was then incumbent on the party who sought to uphold the will to shew, that although in the English form, it was sanctioned by the municipal law of France. Upon this point there was conflicting evidence of experts, decisions, and text-books; but the Court arrived at the conclusion that the will in that form was not allowed by the law of France.

With reference to the witnesses, the Court said, "It is to be lamented that from the very nature of the case we cannot satisfy ourselves, by the personal examinations of those witnesses, as to the weight due to each of them; and a proper sense of professional delicacy precludes them from giving evidence as to the merits of each other. We are compelled, therefore, to decide the disputed questions with inadequate means of judging of their professional eminence, their skill and knowledge. It is to be remarked, speaking with all respect to those gentlemen, that the rule of international law which all English lawyers consider as now firmly established—namely, that the form and solemnities of the testament must be governed by the law of the domicil of the deceased—does not appear to be recognised, or at least borne in mind, by any of them. . . . . Of the five experts examined for the respondents, three think that the will, either in the form required by the law of the domicil of origin or the place where the party dwells, is valid—a position which, by English lawyers, is certainly now considered to be exploded since the case of Stanley v. Bernes, (3 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 373). The whole of these five experts give their opinion that Madame Allegri never was domiciled de facto, according to the law of nations, in France, upon the facts stated in the case. In that respect the Court have already intimated that they entertain a contrary opinion; and that circumstance, although it is quite consistent with their being right in their opinion of the law, a little diminishes the reliance to be put upon it."

The decided cases were hardly more satisfactory. "These decisions," said Lord Wensleydale, delivering the judgment of the Court, "are not treated with the same respect, and are not of so much authority in France, as the decisions of English Courts are in England. By one gentleman there is said to be an adage, that 'the decrees are good for those who obtain them;' and it is said that considerations of equity prevail too often in the decisions of the French Courts, and that they often vary." In order to avoid the doubts and difficulties which arose in this case from the different opinions laid before the Court—quot homines, tot sententiæ—it has been suggested that on such occasions a direct application should be made to the highest French Court of civil judicature for information upon the subject. It is well worthy of consideration whether facilities may not be afforded by the comity of nations for the settlement of these questions, which belong rather to the jus gentium than to merely municipal law.

THE TRANSMISSION OF POWERS.

A MORE liberal rule for construing powers appears to have been adopted by the Lords Justices in the cases of Miller v. Priddon, (1 De G., Mac., & G. 335), Saloway v. Strawbridge, (1 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1194), and Brassey v. Chalmers, (4 De G., Mac., & G. 528), than prevailed in the well-known case of Cooke v. Crawford, (13 Sim. 91); and it is deserving of consideration whether the cases of Wilson v. Bennett, (20 L. J., Ch., 279; 21 L. J., Ch., 741; 16 Jur., part 1, p. 966; 5 De G. & S. 475), Macdonald v. Walker, (14 Beav. 556), In re Burtt's Estate, (1 Drew. 319), and Warburton v. Sandys, (14 Sim. 631), will now be followed, even as between vendor and purchaser.

In Macdonald v. Walker the Master of the Rolls adverted to the great inconvenience of the doctrine of Cooke v. Crawford, when drawn to its full extent, his Honor stating that that decision involved the consequence, that if a power was to be exercised by the heir of a trustee, and the heir happened to be also the devisee (since the new Wills Act) of his ancestor's trust estates, the power was gone; and he intimated doubts whether, in a case impeaching a sale made under a power and circumstances like those before him, Cooke v. Crawford would not be overruled.

It is not uninteresting to observe, that the learned judge who decided Cooke v. Crawford maintained, when Miller v. Priddon was before him, (see 18 L. J., Ch., 226), views opposed to those which the Master of the Rolls in Macdonald v. Walker, and the late Sir J. Parker, V. C., in Wilson v. Bennett, (see 21 L. J., Ch., 741), held to be necessary deductions from the decision in Cooke v. Crawford. This case and that of Warburton v. Sandys are frequently quoted as authorities, that when land is devised, and a power of sale limited to a trustee and his heirs, and that trustee devises to his own executors the legal estate, to be held upon the same trusts as he held them, the power and the estate are separated, and the trustees, heir, and devisees are incompetent, together or separately, to execute the power; and that a person is no trustee until he be clothed with the trust estate. Now, in Miller v. Priddon, the Vice-Chancellor of England held that Cooke was well appointed a trustee; and though the copyholds had not been conveyed to him, and the freeholds were vested in him jointly with Holmes, (who seems not to have been considered a well-appointed trustee), his Honor decided that Cooke could exercise the power of sale, and that the attempted association of Holmes with him in the trusteeship presented no obstacle.

Plainly, the power and the estate had here been separated, and as neither Cooke nor Holmes was ever seised of the copyholds, his Honor did not (as Mr. Sweet infers, 11 Jarm. & Byth. 903, 3rd ed.) conceive it essential, that to make them complete trustees they should obtain the legal estate in the whole trust property.

To some extent the decision of the Court of Appeal in Miller v. Priddon authorises the position, that the donee of a power does not the less effectually execute it by assuming to do so in conjunction with strangers to the power; for as, in their Lordships' view, Cooke was a well-appointed trustee, it seems clear that he, and not the executor of the deceased trustee, should have appointed Holmes new trustee; yet Cooke's acquiescence in an appointment of himself and Holmes to be trustees was construed an effectual appointment by Cooke of Holmes to be an additional trustee.

In Wilson v. Bennett, as appears by the reports in 5 De G. & S. 475, and 21 L. J., Ch., 741, and also in Macdonald v. Walker, real and personal estates were devised to trustees, and powers of sale given to them, and the survivor of them, and the heirs, executors, and administrators of the survivor. The surviving trustee devised the trust estates to his own heir and two others, whom he also appointed executors; but because the heir was not alone seised of the trust estate, it was held that titles depending upon the exercise by him and his co-executors and devisees (or even, according to the late Sir J. Parker's dictum in Wilson v. Bennett, by the heir alone) of the power of sale were not sufficiently free from doubt to be forced upon purchasers.

In Brassey v. Chalmers the testator had devised real estate to Ravenscroft and Fisher, their heirs and assigns, and had given a power of sale to his executors, with the consent of his trustees for the time being. By this expression he could hardly be considered to have intended the persons in whom the legal estate should be vested from time to time, but rather the individuals to whom he had originally devised the estates upon trust; yet the Court of Appeal held new trustees appointed under the Trustee Act, 1850, and in whom the estates were vested by an order under that act, to be competent to consent to the exercise of this power of sale.

In Saloway v. Strawbridge power to sell real estate was given to a mortgagee, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns; the mortgage was transferred, and the transferee dying, his heir conveyed the legal estate to a trustee for the personal representative for the time being; the latter exercised the power of sale, and specific performance of the contract was decreed. The purchaser's difficulty would seem to have been occasioned by the separation of the right to the money and the legal estate; and it might have been said that the personal representative of the transferee was neither the heir, executor, administrator, nor assign of the original mortgagee, as intended by the power.

The tone, however, of that decision, and of those in Miller v. Priddon and Brassey v. Chalmers, will probably relieve the Courts in future cases from the lack of authority which compelled the Master of the Rolls to arrive at the conclusion he did in Macdonald v. Walker.

A PRACTICAL TREATISE on the LAW of BANKRUPTCY in SCOTLAND under the RECENT CONSOLIDATION ACT. With Comparative View of the former Statutes, Digest of Cases, and Directions for Procedure for all Persons interested in Bankrupt Estates in Scotland. By JOHN BOYD KINNEA, Advocate, and of the Inner Temple, Barrister at Law.

"The latest, and unquestionably the best, of the treatises on the practice of this important branch of the law. We are satisfied it will long maintain its character in the Profession of being the standard work on the law and practice of bankruptcy in Scotland."—Journal of Jurisprudence, (Edinburgh).

"Very complete in point of information. In the way of writing, all that was attainable is attained, namely, correctness and clearness."—Scotsman, (Edinburgh).

"The practical directions are exceedingly clear and simple, and will be found very useful."—Glasgow Courier.

LIFE DEPARTMENT.—Under the provisions of an act of Parliament, this Company now offers to future Insurers FOUR-FIFTHS of the PROFITS, with QUINQUENNIAL DIVISION, or a LOW RATE OF PREMIUM without participation of Profits.

The next Division of Profits will be declared in June, 1860, when all Participating Policies which shall have subsisted at least one year at Christmas, 1859, will be allowed to share in the Profits.

At the five Divisions of Profits made by this Company, the total Reversionary Bonuses added to the Policies have exceeded 913,000l.

At the last valuation at Christmas, 1854, the Assurances in force amounted to upwards of 4,240,000l., the Income from the Life Branch in 1854 was more than 200,000l., and the Life Assurance Fund (independent of the Guarantee Capital) exceeded 1,700,000l.

FOREIGN RISKS.—The Extra Premiums required for the East and West Indies, the British Colonies, and the northern parts of the United States of America, have been materially reduced.

INVALID LIVES.—Persons who are not in such sound health as would enable them to Insure their Lives at the Tabular Premiums may have their Lives Insured at extra Premiums.

LOANS granted on Life Policies to the extent of their values, provided such Policies shall have been effected a sufficient time to have attained in each case a value not under 50l.

ASSIGNMENTS OF POLICIES—Written Notices of, received and registered.

Medical fees paid by the Company, and no charge will be made for Policy Stamps.

FIRE DEPARTMENT.—Insurances are effected upon every description of property at moderate rates.

WHEREAS it has lately come to my knowledge that some unprincipled person or persons have for some time past been imposing upon the public, by selling to the Trade and others a spurious article under the name of BOND'S PERMANENT MARKING INK; this is to give Notice, that I am the original and sole Proprietor and Manufacturer of the said Article, and do not employ any traveller, or authorise any persons to represent themselves as coming from my establishment, for the purpose of selling the said Ink. This Caution is published by me to prevent further imposition upon the public, and serious injury to myself.

 To avoid disappointment from the substitution of counterfeits, be careful to ask for the genuine Bond's Permanent Marking Ink; and further to distinguish it, observe that NO SIXPENNY SIZE is or has at any time been prepared by him, the Inventor and Proprietor.

 Orders for THE JURIST given to any Newsman, or letter (post paid) sent to the Office, No. 3, CHANCERY LANE, or to STEVENS & NORTON, 26, BELL YARD, LINCOLN'S INN, will insure its punctual delivery in London, or its being forwarded on the evening of publication, through the medium of the Post Office, to the Country.

Printed by HENRY HANSARD, at his Printing Office, in Parker Street, in the Parish of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, in the County of Middlesex; and Published at No. 3, CHANCERY LANE, in the Parish of St. Dunstan in the West, in the City of London, by HENRY SWEET, residing at No. 34, Porchester Terrace, Bayswater, in the County of Middlesex.—Saturday, May 23, 1857.

A TREATISE on the LAW of VENDORS and PURCHASERS. The Thirteenth Edition, with important Additions. By EDWARD SUGDEN, now LORD ST. LEONARDS. This Edition contains more than 1200 Cases in addition to those in the previous one, and restores the Work to its original character of a Practical Treatise, whilst, like the last edition, it is still a concise and practical view of the subject. The Author has bestowed immense labour in preparing the work for the press.

LONDON, MAY 30, 1857.

IN an article upon the subject of appointments to children, which appeared in our impression of the 25th April, we stated and examined at considerable length the case of Jebb v. Jugwell, or Tugwell, (1 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 460), and expressed an opinion that it should have been held that the appointment there in question was wholly void, and not that the power was merely excessively executed. We arrived at this conclusion upon the assumption that the construction put by the Master of the Rolls upon the will containing the power was correct, and consequently, first, that the terms of the will put it out of the power both of the widow and her daughters to affect the interests of the daughters' children otherwise than by apportionment of the shares; and, secondly, that it was not the testator's intention that in case of an appointment by the widow in her lifetime, in the exercise of the power reserved to her by his will, the daughters should thereby be enabled to dispose of their reversionary interests in the property which they might take by virtue of that appointment. At the same time we fully admitted the principle upon which it was endeavoured to uphold the validity of the appointment, namely, that a power to appoint in such proportions as a person pleases, or a general power to apportion lands, implies that the donee may apportion in such manner as he pleases, and therefore authorises him to create various estates under it, and to give qualified interests; and also, that when under a power, either exclusive or distributive, an appointment is made to a married daughter, although the appointee's share need not be limited to her separate use, yet it will be considered most agreeable to the meaning of the donor of the power that her share should be so limited, unless he has himself expressed an intention to the contrary. At the moment, however, it escaped our recollection that the construction of the will adopted by the Master of the Rolls in Jebb v. Tugwell had not found favour in the sight of the Lords Justices, (see 2 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 54), and that their Lordships had overruled his Honor's decision in that case, and established the validity both of the appointment and subsequent settlement, without prejudice, however, to any question which might afterwards arise as to whether the husband of C., the daughter who had children, would, in the event of his surviving his wife, be entitled to a life interest in the property, or any part of it; although Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, L. J., inclined to think that he would be so entitled. Their Lordships did not assign precisely the same grounds for their opinion, but they both appear to have considered that no intention could be collected from the will to restrain the daughters from disposing of their interests before they came into possession; and they also held that his Honor was mistaken in the effect which he attributed to the clause in the will directing that the fortune of each of the testator's daughters should go to her children after her decease, in such proportions as she might direct. We have merely noticed this case again in order to correct an error into which we might otherwise have led our readers, by omitting to mention the reversal of the Master of the Rolls' decision with respect to the construction of the instrument creating the power. The great principles which were introduced into the discussion of the validity of the appointment have not been impugned on any part; nor does the judgment of the Court of Appeal, as will be seen by reference to the report of the proceedings, and to our previous article, in the slightest degree intrench upon the positions which in that article we undertook to illustrate.

In connexion with the same subject we published in our number of the 2nd May a letter from a correspondent, who suggests that the judgment of Sir W. P. Wood, V. C., in the case of Fry v. Capper, (1 Kay, 163), has rendered it doubtful whether a clause in restraint of anticipation can lawfully be annexed to an appointment in favour of a daughter to her separate use; and at the same time cites the cases of Carver v. Bowles, (2 Russ. & M. 304); Thornton v. Bright, (2 My. & C. 230); and Dickenson v. Mort, (8 Hare, 178), to shew that the high authority of Sir John Leach, Lord Cottenham, and Sir J. Wigram is opposed to the invalidity of such a condition. Now, in the first place, we have no hesitation in asserting, that wherever a valid appointment of any interest in real or personal property is made either to a married or single woman to her separate use, and thereto is annexed a clause in restraint of anticipation, which is not prohibited by the manifest intention of the instrument creating the power, and which does not prevent alienation beyond the limits allowed by law, that clause is valid and effectual. Nor is it of the slightest consequence to the determination of the validity of the clause whether the power is one to appoint amongst children, or amongst any other class of persons. But the real question which in the case of Fry v. Capper the Vice-Chancellor was called upon to decide was not whether in an appointment to a daughter a clause restraining anticipation is ever valid, or under what circumstances it is valid, but whether such a clause is valid when annexed to an appointment to a woman, unborn at the creation of the power, but under coverture at the time when the instrument executing the power came into operation; and if invalid in the particular case, whether the appointment for the benefit of the married daughter could itself be supported. It is with the first part of this question that we are principally concerned; although we may at once say, that in our opinion the Vice-Chancellor was perfectly correct upon all points. At the same time we do not deny the difficulty of reconciling the previous cases cited by our correspondent with the rejection of the condition in Fry v. Capper as inoperative; but we think, that, independently of those cases, it would be easy to prove that his Honor's decision was quite in accordance with established principles. It is well known that under a particular power no estate can be created which would not have been valid if limited in the instrument creating the power. If, then, in the case of Fry v. Capper, we read the appointment made by the donee of the power, who was tenant for life under the settlement, in conjunction with the settlement itself, by which the power was created, the limitations of the equitable estate will, so far as material, stand thus:—To A. for life; and after A.'s decease, to B., an unborn daughter, for her life, for her separate use, but without power of anticipation; and after B.'s decease, as B. should by deed or will appoint; and in default of appointment, to her executors or administrators. Take away the restraint upon anticipation, and the result is equivalent to a mode of disposition which was upheld as legitimate in the case of Bray v. Hammersley, (3 Sim. 513; S. C., nom. Bray v. Bree, 2 Cl. & Fin. 453). It is exactly the same thing as if a life interest had been limited to A., and a general power of appointment, after A.'s decease, had been given to a daughter of A., unborn at the date of the deed; and in default of appointment, the estate limited upon trust for her for life, for her separate use; and after her decease, to her executors or administrators. In this there is no infringement of the rule against perpetuities. The property is not tied up an instant longer than the life of A., for the separate use is no impediment to alienation, but, on the contrary, rather facilitates it, where the fund is in the hands of trustees. If, however, to a set of limitations in the above form, where an unborn daughter, who will be under coverture at the time when her interest vests, is either made tenant for life simply, or takes, upon the decease of the survivor of lives in being at the date of the deed, what is equivalent to an absolute interest in the property, you attach a condition that she shall not anticipate the income, it is manifest that, even supposing the restraint to be confined to the life of a single husband, a period much longer than twenty-one years after a life or lives in being at the time when the instrument creating the limitations comes into operation may elapse before the property can be alienated. A free and unfettered power of alienation, as an inseparable incident to an estate, has ever been considered most important to the welfare of the community. The desire to confine the suspension of this power within fixed and certain limits mainly conduced to the establishment of the rule against perpetuities; and although here there is no postponement of the vesting of the estate beyond the prescribed term, yet that rule is no less infringed by rendering possible the occurrence of an evil, which the prohibition of that very postponement was especially designed to remove. Could it, then, have been the intention of the Court of Chancery, when that Court determined to give effect to a clause restraining a married woman from anticipating or alienating her separate property, deliberately to break through a rule which has received the solemn sanction of all the judges on a question propounded to them by the highest tribunal in the kingdom, and which has ever been deemed one of the most vital principles of the law? No doubt, when gifts to the separate use of a married woman were first supported in equity, a legal principle was equally violated. A clear encroachment was thereby made upon the marital right, as maintained by the common law, which refuses to recognise the separate existence of a feme covert. But in this particular equity interposed to amend what the general sense of the nation admitted to be a defect in our system of jurisprudence, and so to adapt that system, the efficiency of which it is jealous to preserve, to wants which were universally felt and acknowledged. On all ordinary occasions the maxim prevails, that equity follows the law, and therefore a Court of equity will be very careful of interfering with a doctrine which constitutes a valuable safeguard to the interests of society at large. One exception makes many, and by meddling too frequently with the foundations of a building you may cause the whole superstructure to totter and to fall. The separate use, as we have said, puts no obstacle in the way of alienation; and the clause against anticipation, which was introduced as a modification of the separate estate, was designed merely to effectuate more completely the wishes of the donor, by preventing the security which he had intended to attach to his gift from being destroyed through the influence of the husband over the mind of the wife—an influence often found to be as powerful for the purpose as the unqualified legal right. The intention of the donor was to give the object of his bounty all the faculties of a feme sole, excepting the power of alienation; and in this attempt equity was willing enough to aid him, so long as he did not limit the estate in a manner which would restrict the absolute disposal of it beyond the term prescribed by law; but there is not the faintest symptom, in the early cases at least, that the judges were prepared to go any further. (See the judgment of Lord Langdale in Tullett v. Armstrong, 1 Beav. 33). "I do not," said Lord Thurlow, who first suggested the clause, "hereby take away any of the incidents of property at law; this interest which a married woman is suffered to take is a creature of equity, and equity may modify the power of alienation." (1 Rose, 200). But if this interest is a creature of equity, equity cannot modify the power of alienation, so as, for a time exceeding the legal limits, to deprive the owner of the full enjoyment of the estate, without taking away an additional incident of property at law, and one which the separate use did not touch. Moreover, the doctrine as to the separate estate was for a long time by no means well settled; and it is to be observed, that in all the cases cited by our correspondent it was contended that the separate use was itself invalid, and in none of them does the question, whether the modification of it infringed the rule against perpetuities, appear to have presented itself to the minds either of the counsel or the judge. So far as we can collect from the reports, which are scanty, no distinction between the two was suggested in the argument or noticed in the judgment. In the report of Carver v. Bowles the reasoning of the counsel, and the grounds upon which the Master of the Rolls proceeded in his judgment, are not stated; but the question which was raised with respect to the restriction against anticipation was, whether, if the shares were well appointed to the daughters absolutely, that restriction, and the limitations to the separate use of the daughters during their lives, were valid, having regard to the terms of the power contained in the settlement; and the Master of the Rolls held that they were. But the terms of the power were amply sufficient to warrant the limitations to the separate use, and, irrespective of the transgression of the rule against perpetuities, the restraint upon anticipation likewise; and this circumstance, added to the coupling of the two subjects together in one question, and the silence of the report, renders it more than probable that the precise point was never thought of in this case at all. Lord St. Leonards several times alludes to another and the main topic of discussion in Carver v. Bowles, but only once to the restraint upon anticipation, and then with a "But see as to this point," referring to his own chapter on the subject, which can hardly be construed otherwise than as an expression of his disapproval. (2 Sugd. Pow. 33, 150, 259, note (s)). In Thornton v. Bright, where, by a settlement of real estate on marriage, an exclusive power was given to the tenant for life to appoint the legal estate to his children, it was held that an appointment to trustees for the separate use of a daughter during the joint lives of herself and her husband was a valid exercise of the power, and the trustees were directed to pay the rents to the separate use of the daughter during the joint lives of herself and her husband. Though the words "without power of anticipation" were annexed to the trust, the question of their validity was certainly not contested, and seems never to have been brought forward; and they are omitted in the short statement which the reporter gives of the decree. In Dickenson v. Mort it was also contended, that not only the clause against anticipation, but likewise the trust for the separate use of the married daughter for life, was invalid, and that the effect of the appointment was to give to her the absolute interest in the sum charged as a portion, unaffected by either of these conditions. The report is very brief; but from the judgment it would be inferred that the objection urged in this case was, that the donee of the power could not appoint less than the absolute interest; and the Vice-Chancellor correctly held that he could.

From our remarks it will be seen that we do not think the cases cited by our correspondent amount to a conclusive condemnation of the decision of Sir W. P. Wood, V. C., in Fry v. Capper. A careful scrutiny into the authorities leads us to believe that his Honor was the first judge before whom the topic we have been discussing was fairly started; and recurrence to general principles confirms to our mind the soundness of his opinion. A case, however, might occur in which the matter would be still further complicated. In all the cases that have been mentioned, the appointee, unborn at the creation of the power, was under coverture when the appointment took effect. Assuming that the clause restraining anticipation would in such a case be invalid, would it be equally void if the appointee had no husband alive when the appointment came into operation? In the absence of authority we think not; because, as the restraint upon anticipation, equally with the separate use, can exist only during coverture, she would always be able to preclude its operation. The appointment, if inserted in the instrument creating the power, would amount to a limitation to one for life, and after his decease, to his unborn daughter; but, in case of the daughter's marriage, imposing a contingent restraint upon alienation, which restraint, however, it must be within her capacity before marriage to defeat, because at the time when her interest vests she will be a feme sole. A state of circumstances cannot arise in which the instrument can fasten the restraint upon her against her will.

ON SIR ERSKINE PERRY'S BILL.

This bill does not in general even attempt to preserve vested interests, and whatever may be the proper course to adopt as to the property of women hereafter to be married, it is strongly opposed to the principles which have always guided our Legislature, that the right which, at the passing of this act, a husband may have to the enjoyment of his wife's real estate during their joint lives, and to the possession of such real estate as tenant by curtesy, should be at once either destroyed or placed in the power of the wife. The 1st section of the proposed act confers on a married woman the power of alienating, devising, and bequeathing real and personal estate, as if she were a feme sole—the rights of the husband, in consideration of which he may have settled his whole property on the wife, or have impoverished himself in payment of her debts, ante-nuptial or otherwise, being entirely disregarded. From the 3rd section, which in effect settles to the separate use of married women all after-acquired property, it would appear that such after-acquired property alone was intended to be dealt with by this act; but the absolute powers of alienating, devising, and bequeathing given by the 1st section are too clear to be overruled by the 3rd section; the two sections are, however, incongruous, and one of them is clearly unnecessary. If a married woman have an absolute power, as given by sect. 1, to hold, acquire, alien, devise, and bequeath real and personal estate as a feme sole, it is unnecessary to provide by the 3rd section that her after-acquired property shall vest absolutely in her, and be subject to her sole disposition. As to the 4th section, nothing need be said here, as the question whether the husband interfere in the management or participate in the profits of the occupation or trade carried on by the wife will doubtless be sufficiently discussed in each several case. The 6th section appears to afford a remarkable instance of the result of careless drawing. By this section the surviving child of a married woman dying intestate would take the personal estate of such married woman to the absolute exclusion of her grandchildren and of other descendants of deceased children. If this be the intention of Sir E. Perry, such intention should have been shewn either by the title or the preamble of the bill. The general effect of sects. 7 and 8 appears to be, that if a married woman publish a libel, or otherwise injure any third person, the injured party, after having obtained a verdict, may, if so inclined, take in execution goods or other property of the husband to the extent of the value of the goods or property acquired by the husband from the wife. No machinery being provided for shewing the value of the goods or property so acquired by the husband, a prudent person will most probably rather put up with the first loss than attempt to estimate the exact amount which he may legally attach. It may be remarked, that though the husband is in every case made liable only to the extent to which he has been benefited by his wife, yet he may, in repeated cases, be liable in each for the whole of such amount. The 10th section is of so monstrous a character, placing as it does almost unlimited powers in the hands of the county court judges, that it is impossible that that section can be allowed to pass. As a further instance of the carelessness with which this act has been prepared, we may notice that no power is given to the judges, authorised to act under this section, to compel the production of books or papers. An inventory of the separate property of a man as proposed to be prepared (sect. 11) is at least a novelty, and we should have been grateful to Sir E. Perry had he condescended to explain whether an inventory filed in pursuance be notice, and to whom, of the proprietorship of the property in such inventory. Under the 12th section it seems doubtful whether a husband, who may have failed to spend the rents and profits of his wife's estate, would not at her death be liable to account for the accumulations thereof. The interpretation clause (sect. 14) requires a further interpretation clause for its explanation. We confess that we do not know what is meant by hereditaments of "tenant right" tenure.

J. T. C.

THE PROPERTY OF MARRIED WOMEN BILL.

If this bill passes, it will, with many others that have passed, furnish proof of the want of a "board," or "department," for examining, amending, and reporting upon the details and language of all bills—a board from which, if it were required to give critical reasons for all the alterations recommended by it, we might expect in time to receive valuable contributions to the science of legislative expression—a science at present in its infancy, and almost unknown. We respect the intentions of the gentlemen who have brought in this bill, and we hope that very much more will be done on behalf of married women than they have attempted to do; but it is our duty to shew that the bill is too ill drawn to be fit for passing in its present shape, or in any possible amended form; in short, that, as Mr. Joshua Williams would say, it has not been conceived or drawn by a conveyancer.

The framer of the bill seems to be unaware that the genus includes the species. He first enacts, generally, (sect. 1), that a married woman shall from the passing of the act be capable of holding, acquiring, alienating, devising, and bequeathing real and personal estate, and of suing and being sued, as if she were a feme sole; and then makes a variety of particular enactments, which collectively do not extend to the limits of the general enactment, and would be superfluous if that were capable of operation.

Sect. 1. "From and after the passing of this act a married woman shall be capable of holding, acquiring, alienating, devising, and bequeathing real and personal estate, and of suing and being sued, as if she were a feme sole."

2. "No marriage solemnised after the 1st January, 1858, shall operate any change in or effect any charge on the real and personal estate of either husband or wife, except in so far as shall be specified in any settlement or agreement for a settlement made before the marriage."

Why, in this case only, wait until the 2nd January? But, first, what does this mean? Is dower or curtesy a change or a charge? Is the power of reduction into possession a change or a charge?

3. "All real and personal estate hereafter acquired by any married woman, and which but for the passing of this act would fall under the control of, or vest absolutely in, the husband, shall vest absolutely in the wife, and be subject to her sole disposition and control."

Very well; but is not sect. 1 intended to do this, and much more?

4. "The earnings of a married woman, in any occupation or trade carried on by her separately from the occupation or trade of her husband, shall be deemed to be her personal estate; and as to all engagements or contracts entered into by her with respect to such occupation or trade, she shall be solely liable, unless her husband interferes in the management or participates in the profits of such occupation or trade."

We need only hint at two of the innumerable questions that would arise on this enactment. What would be a husband's interfering in the management, and what a husband's participating in the profits of a trade?

5. "Upon the death of a married woman intestate, her husband shall take the same distributive share in her personal estate as such married woman would take in the personal estate of her husband if he died intestate."

A wife dies intestate, leaving a husband who is childless, and children by a deceased husband. She would take one-half of her second husband's personal estate if he died intestate; shall he take one-half of hers? Does the clause apply to a partial intestacy?

6. "Subject to the last-mentioned provision, the personal estate of such married woman shall, if she leave any children, be distributed among them equally; or, if she leave only one child, the same shall go to such child; but if she leave no child, then the said personal estate shall go to or be distributed among such person or persons as would, under the Statute of Distributions, be entitled thereto had such married woman died a feme sole, and her real estate shall descend to her next heirs."

This is an incorrect, clumsy, and imperfect provision as to personalty, under which an uncle would rob his nephews and nieces; and it includes a superfluous and incorrect declaration respecting real estate, under which estates pur autre vie would be transmissible to the heir, and, perhaps, customary descents would be abolished.

7. "A married woman shall be liable upon any contract which she may have entered into before marriage, or which she may enter into on her own account, or jointly with her husband, after marriage, and also for any pecuniary damage caused by her own wrong."

8. "A husband shall not be liable for the debts of his wife contracted before marriage, or for any pecuniary damage caused by her own wrong, either before or after the marriage; but in every judgment obtained against the wife, of whatsoever nature, it shall be lawful for the plaintiff to take in execution the goods or other property of the husband, but only to the extent of the amount or value of such goods or property acquired by the husband from or on behalf of his wife, by ante-nuptial settlement or otherwise."

"Liable." How liable? Does this include liability to arrest and imprisonment on final process? What is pecuniary damage? Damages are paid in money; but they are a fruit, not a cause, of action.

The husband's property is to be liable to execution on a judgment against his wife, to the extent of the amount or value of "such" goods or property acquired by the husband from or "on behalf of" his wife. Is he to be liable over and over again? For instance—by settlement he acquires 1000*l.* sterling from his wife. A judgment is obtained against the wife for 1000*l.*, and levied from the goods of the husband. The wife contracts further debts, which the husband compromises by paying 1000*l.* to the creditors. Then a judgment is obtained by other creditors of the wife. Are the husband's goods again liable to execution to the extent of 1000*l.*? Must the creditors exhaust the wife's assets first? Will the husband, after execution, be entitled to indemnity out of his wife's property? Will he be liable after separation and alimony? &c., &c.

9. "In all possessory actions the joint possession of husband and wife shall be deemed to be the possession of the husband, and it shall not be necessary to join the wife in any such action; and in all claims by third parties against husband and wife, or against the husband alone, the title to personal property, in the apparent possession of the husband, shall be deemed to be in him until the contrary be shewn."

10. "In any question of title as to property or possession between husband and wife it shall be competent to either party to apply by petition to any judge of the superior courts of Westminster Hall, or to the judge of the county court of the district wherein the petitioner shall reside; and such judge shall thereupon, if he sees fit, order the parties to attend before him, and shall proceed to hear them (or either of them, if the other party after due notice fail to appear) and their witnesses vivâ voce, and in a summary way, without any pleadings touching the matter in dispute, and in his private room, if the parties so require; and shall thereupon make such order as to the property or possession, or as to a further inquiry, as justice may require; and any breach of such order shall be treated as the breach of an order of the Court of Chancery, and be punished accordingly."

11. "Upon any such application it shall be competent to the judge to order an inventory of any property, which after due inquiry shall appear to be the separate property of either husband or wife, to be prepared at the expense of the applicant, and to be filed of record in his court."

"Any question of title as to property or possession." What does this mean? Whatever it means is placed within the jurisdiction of a county court judge, though the amount be 100,000*l.*, and the order of the judge is to be enforced as an order of the Court of Chancery. Whether otherwise enforceable does not appear.

12. "When a married woman, having real or personal estate, has allowed her husband to receive the rents and profits, or to use and dispose of the personalty, the husband shall not be held liable to account for such rents, profits, and personalty for any period during which he has so received and disposed of them with such consent as aforesaid; and in the case of her death, he shall be held liable to account only for such rents, profits, and personalty as are in his hands or under his disposition and control."

When will a wife be said to have "allowed" her husband to take her property? Is temporary acquiescence under baculine persuasion allowance?

14. "In the construction of this act, the words 'real estate' shall extend to manors, advowsons, messuages, lands, tithes, rent-charges in lieu of tithes, rents, and hereditaments, whether freehold, customary freehold, tenant right, customary, or copyhold, or of any other tenure, and whether corporeal, incorporeal, or personal, and whether the same shall be in possession, reversion, remainder, or contingency, and to any undivided share thereof, and to any estate, right, or interest (other than a chattel interest) therein; and the words 'personal estate' shall extend to leasehold estates and other chattels real, and also to monies, shares of Government and other funds, securities for money, (not being real estates), debts, choses in action, rights, credits, goods, and all other property whatsoever which by law devolves upon the executor or administrator, and whether the same be in possession, reversion, remainder, or contingency, and to any share or interest therein."

Under this clause an estate pur autre vie, not specially limited to the heirs, will be two gentlemen in one.

15. "This act shall not extend to Scotland or Ireland."

"Nor to England" should be added.

If Sir Erskine Perry and Mr. M. Milnes find themselves covered with ridicule on account of this unfortunate bill, let them console themselves by reflecting that its absurdities, though more obvious, are not really greater than those of nine-tenths of the bills that are brought into Parliament; that there are, perhaps, some acts of Parliament nearly as bad; that there are not twenty well-drawn public acts in existence; and that the public and the Legislature, and, to a great extent, the lawyers, are still unaware that drawing for legislation is an art of extreme difficulty, which is not possessed by one lawyer out of twenty, even though learned and otherwise skilful, and a conveyancer.

The writer of this notice will seek a more worthy occasion to discuss the important question, which has been raised in the pages of The Jurist and elsewhere, as to the propriety of giving to a married woman rights of property while personal liberty is withheld. The objection put by Lord Campbell to Lord Brougham's bill of the last session, in the form of the question, "What is to become of the children?" has been properly answered in a leading article of The Jurist, (ante, p. 140). But that question, or rather the editor's comment on it, suggests serious considerations as to the expediency of altering the law in respect of the obligations of parents to children. It is a whimsical reason, or would appear so to a foreigner, to give for the legal liability of a parent to maintain his children, and characteristic of the fortuitous origin of our laws—"that otherwise the rates of a parish might be increased;" and the whole subject of parental duty must have caused much perplexity to Blackstone, who is so anxious to identify the English laws with those of nature and of God, and yet can find no legal sanction for the duty of parents to maintain and educate their children, other than the statute of Elizabeth and a negative decision of Sir John Holt, on the duty of maintenance, and Puffendorff, and some statutes relating to parish apprentices and to Papists, on that of education. It is certainly the duty of a parent to spend a fair portion of his means in educating his children; and if we can so easily sanction an inquisition into men's incomes in order to provide for the wants of the state and of Dowb., we ought not to find an insuperable difficulty in extracting from every taxable man a suitable education for his children.

103. Rules and orders to be laid before Parliament.

ABSTRACT OF A BILL

To amend the Law relating to Divorce and Matrimonial Causes in England.

Sect. 1. Commencement of act.

2. Jurisdiction in matters matrimonial now vested in ecclesiastical courts to cease, except as to granting marriage licenses.

3. The new court may enforce prior decrees or orders.

4. Pending suits to be transferred to new court.

5. Power to judges whose jurisdiction is determined to deliver written judgments in cases standing for judgment.

6. Jurisdiction over causes matrimonial to be exercised by the Court of Marriage and Divorce, provided that no suit shall be entertained for jactitation of marriage.

7. The Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, the Lord Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer, and the Judge of her Majesty's Court of Probate constituted by any act of the present session, shall be the judges of the said court, and any three of them, of whom the judge of the Court of Probate shall be one, shall be a quorum.

8. The judge of the Court of Probate shall be called the Judge Ordinary of the said court, and shall have full authority, either alone or with one or more of the other judges of the said court, to hear and determine all matters arising therein, except petitions for the dissolving of a marriage and applications for new trials of questions or issues before a jury, and, except as last aforesaid, may exercise all the powers and authority of the said court.

9. During the temporary absence of the Judge Ordinary, the Lord Chancellor may by writing under his hand authorise the Master of Rolls, or either of the Lords Justices, or any Vice-Chancellor, or any judge of the superior courts of law at Westminster, to act as Judge Ordinary of the said Court of Marriage and Divorce, and the Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice, Vice-Chancellor, or judge of the superior courts shall, when so acting, have and exercise all the jurisdiction, power, and authority which might have been exercised by the Judge Ordinary alone.

10. Sittings of the court.

11. Seal of the court.

12. Officers of the court.

13. Advocates and proctors of any ecclesiastical court in England shall have the exclusive right of practising in the said Court of Marriage and Divorce in all matters which the Judge Ordinary may, without the concurrence of any other judge thereof, hear and determine; and the said advocates and proctors, and also all barristers, attornies, and solicitors entitled to practise in the superior courts at Westminster, shall be entitled to practise as counsel, solicitors, or attornies respectively in the Court of Marriage and Divorce in all cases of petitions for the dissolving of a marriage, subject to such regulations as may be made by the said court.

14. The Court of Marriage and Divorce to act on the principles of the ecclesiastical courts.

15. Any wife may present a petition to the said court praying for a divorce à mensâ et thoro, on the ground that she has been deserted by her husband, and that such desertion has continued, without reasonable excuse, for two years or upwards; and the court, on being satisfied of the truth of the allegations of such petition, may, if it shall see fit, decree a divorce à mensâ et thoro accordingly, and may make any order for alimony which it may deem just.

16. Court may direct payment of alimony to wife or trustee.

17. In every case of a divorce à mensâ et thoro the wife shall, from the date of the sentence, and whilst the separation shall continue, be considered as a feme sole with respect to property of every description which she may afterwards acquire, or which may come to or devolve upon her, and such property may be disposed of by her in all respects as a feme sole, and on her decease the same shall, in case she shall die intestate, go as the same would have gone if her husband had been then dead: provided, that if any such wife should again cohabit with her husband, all such property as she may be entitled to when such cohabitation shall take place shall be held to her separate use, subject, however, to any agreement in writing made between herself and her husband whilst separate.

18. In every case of a divorce à mensâ et thoro the wife shall, whilst so separated, be considered as a feme sole for the purposes of contract, and suing and being sued in any civil proceeding; and her husband shall not be liable in respect of any engagement or contract she may have entered into, or for any costs she may incur as plaintiff or defendant: provided, that where, upon any such divorce, alimony has been decreed or ordered to be paid to the wife, and the same shall not be duly paid by the husband, he shall be liable for necessaries supplied for her use: provided also, that nothing shall prevent the wife from joining, at any time during such separation, in the exercise of any joint power given to herself and her husband.

19. It shall be lawful for any husband to present a petition to the said court praying that his marriage may be dissolved, on the ground that his wife has, since the celebration thereof, been guilty of adultery; and it shall be lawful for any wife to present a petition to the said court praying that her marriage may be dissolved, on the ground that since the celebration thereof her husband has been guilty of incestuous adultery, or of bigamy, or of adultery coupled with such cruelty as, without adultery, would have entitled her to a divorce à mensâ et thoro, or of adultery coupled with desertion, without reasonable excuse, for two years or upwards; and every such petition shall state, as distinctly as the nature of the case permits, the facts on which the claim to have such marriage dissolved is founded: provided that, for the purposes of this act, incestuous adultery shall be taken to mean adultery committed by a husband with a woman with whom, if his wife were dead, he could not lawfully contract marriage, by reason of her being within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity or affinity.

20. Upon any such petition for the dissolution of a marriage, it shall be the duty of the court to satisfy itself, so far as it reasonably can, not only as to the facts alleged, but also whether or no the petitioner has been in any manner accessary to or conniving at the adultery, or has condoned the same, and shall also inquire into any counter charge which may be made against the petitioner.

21. In case the court, on the evidence in relation to any such petition, shall not be satisfied that the alleged adultery has been committed, or shall find that the petitioner has during the marriage been guilty of adultery, or has been accessary to or conniving at the adultery complained of, or has condoned the same, then and in any of the said cases the court shall dismiss the said petition.

22. In case the court shall be satisfied on the evidence that the case of the petitioner has been proved, and shall not find that the petitioner has committed adultery during the marriage, or has been in any manner accessary to or conniving at the adultery complained of, or has condoned the same, then the court shall pronounce a decree declaring such marriage to be dissolved: provided always, that the court shall not be bound to pronounce such decree if the petitioner shall, in the opinion of the court, have been guilty of unreasonable delay in presenting or prosecuting such petition, or of cruelty towards the other party to the marriage, or of having deserted the other party before the adultery complained of, and without reasonable excuse.

23. The court may, if it shall think fit, on any such decree made on the petition of a husband, make it a condition that the petitioner shall, to the satisfaction of the court, secure to the wife such gross sum of money, or such annual sum of money, for any term not exceeding her own life, as, having regard to her fortune, if any, to the ability of the husband, and to the conduct of the parties, it shall deem reasonable; and for that purpose may refer it to any one of the conveyancing counsel of the Court of Chancery to settle and approve of a proper deed or instrument to be executed by the petitioner and other necessary parties; and the said court may in such case, if it shall see fit, suspend the pronouncing of its decree until such deed shall have been duly executed.

24. In any suit or other proceeding for obtaining a divorce à mensâ et thoro, or a decree of nullity of marriage, and on any petition for dissolving a marriage, the court may, from time to time, before making its final decree, make such interim orders, and may make such provision in the final decree, as it may deem just and proper, with respect to the custody, maintenance, and education of the children the marriage of whose parents is the subject of such suit or other proceeding, and may, if it shall think fit, direct proper proceedings to be taken for placing such children under the protection of the Court of Chancery.

25. Questions of fact may be tried before the court and a jury.

26. Court may direct issues to try any fact.

27. New trials.

28. Affidavit in support of a petition.

29. Service of petition.

30. The court may, if it shall think fit, order the attendance of the petitioner, and may examine him or her, or permit him or her to be examined or cross-examined on oath on the hearing of any petition, but no such petitioner shall be bound to answer any question tending to shew that he or she has been guilty of adultery.

31. Adjournment.

32. Subject to such rules and regulations as may be established as herein provided, the witnesses in all proceedings before the Court of Marriage and Divorce, where their attendance can be had, shall be sworn and examined orally in open court: provided that parties shall be at liberty to verify their respective cases in whole or in part by affidavit, but so that the deponent in every such affidavit shall, on the application of the opposite party or by direction of the court, be subject to be cross-examined by or on behalf of the opposite party orally in open court, and after such cross-examination may be re-examined orally in open court as aforesaid by or on behalf of the party by whom such affidavit was filed.

33. Court may issue commissions or give orders for examination of witnesses abroad or unable to attend.

34. Rules of evidence in common-law courts to be observed.

35. Attendance of witnesses on the court.

36. Penalties for false evidence.

37. Costs.

38. Enforcement of orders and decrees.

39. Power to make rules and orders for procedure.

40. Fees to be regulated.

41. Appeal from the judge ordinary to the full court.

42. Appeal to the House of Lords in case of petition for dissolution of a marriage.

43. Liberty to [innocent*] parties to marry again.

46. Produce of fees and stamps to be paid to a fee fund account.

47. Compensation to registrars, &c. of existing courts.

48. Payment of salaries, &c.

49. Drafts on fee fund.

50. Power to Lord Chancellor to order surplus of fee fund to be paid into the Exchequer. Deficiency to be paid out of Consolidated Fund.

52. Rules to be laid before Parliament.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, JUNE 6, 1857.

Mr. Commissioner Holroyd has recently* put a construction upon the meaning of the words "gaming" and "wagering" in the 201st section of the Bankrupt-law Consolidation Act, 1849. By that section no bankrupt is entitled to a certificate if he has lost by any sort of gaming or wagering in one day 20*l.*, or within one year before the filing of the petition for adjudication 200*l.*, or within that period 200*l.* by any contract for the purchase or sale of any government or other stock, where such contract was not to be performed within one week after the contract, or where the stock bought or sold was not actually transferred or delivered in pursuance of such contract. It appeared that in 1854 the bankrupt had lost 20*l.* in one day by time bargains in Consols, and in 1855, 20*l.* in one day by like dealings in Turkish scrip; and the case, therefore, came within the first if any branch of the above section.

The first point decided by the learned commissioner was, that the words "gaming or wagering" in this section applied to all gaming and wagering, and whether at lawful or unlawful games. The same words are used as in the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 18, by which "all contracts by way of gaming or wagering shall be null and void;" and there is nothing to confine the terms to any particular kind of games, as in the older acts.

Secondly, it was held that the circumstance of some particular dealings in the funds being mentioned in the second branch of the above section did not exclude from its first branch any dealings in the funds which amounted to gaming or wagering. The learned judge was of opinion that the Legislature intended by the words in the second branch of the section to include dealings which might not amount to gaming or wagering, and not to exclude from the first branch dealings which came within the fair and obvious meaning of those terms, for otherwise the effect would be to give a different meaning to the words "gaming or wagering" as used in the Bankrupt-law Consolidation Act from that which they bear as used in the stat. 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. (See Parsons v. Alexander, 5 El. & Bl. 263; Nicholson v. Gooch, Id. 999; Grizewood v. Blane, 11 C. B. 538; Ex parte Copeland, 1 Bank. App. Cas. 208; and Mortimer v. M'Callan, 6 M. & W. 58, 70; 7 Id. 20; 9 Id. 636).

Thirdly, that the dealings in Turkish scrip, though not coming within the second branch of the 201st section, or the stat. 7 Geo. 2, c. 8, yet resolved themselves into wagers within the meaning of the first branch, as they had also been held to come within the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. (See Nicholson v. Gooch and Grizewood v. Blane, supra). The case of Ex parte Wade, (2 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 218; 25 L. J., Bank., 6), in which the Lords Justices granted a certificate after a certain period of suspension, notwithstanding the bankrupt had incurred a loss of 420*l.* on a purchase of some Turkish scrip for a future day, was held not to be binding as a precedent; for Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, L. J., in delivering his judgment, had expressly desired that it should not be so considered, but as founded on the particulars facts of that case alone, which were very special.

* In re Thomas Ryder, a Bankrupt, (June 2).

In the course of his judgment in this case Mr. Commissioner Holroyd also made some important observations with reference to trading upon credit or fictitious capital. "I think it right to state," said the learned judge, "by way of example and warning to others, that a trader in insolvent circumstances, who speculates in consignments of goods in the manner pursued by this bankrupt, is giving way to a species of gaming which requires to be repressed equally with the gaming or wagering within the meaning of the Bankrupt-law Consolidation Act." The course of business pursued by the bankrupt was stated to be this:—He began business as an East India merchant in 1854, being at that time without capital, and in debt; from that period, as soon as he bought goods, he got advances upon them, averaging about 70*l.* per cent., and the goods were then shipped to different parts of the world, through the parties who made the advances. By this system he contrived for a time to be apparently making his payments in due course, but, as he admitted, he was always insolvent, and getting from bad to worse. "The only excuse," said the learned commissioner, "that can be attempted for the bankrupt is the great facility with which persons in this country obtain advances on goods. But is this a legitimate excuse? Is the vendor of goods to be the only sufferer? Must not rather the trader, who, without due caution, and beyond reasonable bounds, takes advantage of this facility, do so at his peril? It appears to me that the system of obtaining advances on goods, however usual it may be with traders, is, unless exercised with great circumspection, most mischievous, and calls loudly for the severe reprehension of this Court. With rising markets such a system may go on for a time, as a trader may then find it easy to raise money upon his purchases, and so sustain his credit for a while, and have the semblance of being well to do in the world; but as soon as a reverse comes—that is, when markets fall—the trader, who has too readily given way to such a course of speculation, if he has no capital to fall back upon to meet losses, must soon sink, and with little or nothing for his unsecured creditors. . . . The amount of credit which a trader thinks fit to take should bear some relative proportion to the amount of his capital." The learned commissioner then quoted with approbation the language used by Pollock, C. B., on a recent occasion, to the effect that the most prolific source of misery in this country arises from persons trading beyond their capital and living beyond their means, and that no man is justified in carrying on his business for a single day beyond the time he is able to meet his liabilities.

The Solicitor-General.—The appointment of Mr. Keating to the office of Solicitor-General is honourable to the Government and to himself. He has the well-earned reputation of being a sound lawyer, an industrious, pains-taking, earnest advocate, and a gentleman of high professional honour. The independent course which he has taken in Parliament affords the best answer to those who assert that lawyers vote with a view to their own interests. To his predecessor, Mr. Stuart Wortley, we beg to offer our sympathy, and to express our best wishes for the speedy re-establishment of his health, so that the public may not long be deprived of his valuable services, both as a legislator and a lawyer.

REGISTRATION OF TITLE TO LAND.

The Report of the Commissioners appointed to consider this subject has been presented to Parliament. The following are the principal features in the registration which they recommend:—

"52. A land register and transfer office for England and Wales will be established in London, under the management of a registrar-general; and branch offices will be also established in different districts throughout the kingdom, subject to the orders and regulated by the authority of the registrar-general.

"53. The registration will extend to all corporeal hereditaments except copyholds, and to advowsons and rent-charges, except, perhaps, tithe rent-charges.

"54. After the establishment of the office all owners or proprietors of land who have the right of possessing or the power of disposing of it in fee-simple will be at liberty to apply for the registration of the ownership thereof; so that such ownership, or the title to the land which is the subject of the same, may thenceforth be manifested by the register alone.

"Supposing this to be accomplished safely and with prudence, the effect of the register, when in complete operation, will be to render it unnecessary, in dealing with land which has so been registered, to look beyond the last ownership appearing on the register.

"55. Registration of title is proposed to be twofold—one which shall at once enable the registered owner to transfer the estate, with a present or immediate statutory title; the other, registration of actual ownership, without the power to transfer an immediate statutory title.

"56. In the second of these cases—that is, in the case of registration unattended with immediate statutory title—the parties applying will be required to produce before the registrar a declaration on oath, stating that they are in the actual enjoyment of the rents and profits, and that they believe themselves to be absolutely entitled to the land in fee-simple, free from all incumbrances, or subject only to such incumbrances as are distinctly specified; and they will also be required to produce, where it can be done, the last instrument of conveyance of the fee-simple, or such other evidence as the registrar may find it necessary to require, with the view of excluding fraudulent claims. Powers also will be conferred on the registrar to give such public and other notices as he may deem necessary of the intention of the parties to have the property registered, in order that they may not wrongfully procure a registration which may be detrimental to other persons.

"But where the title to lands has been ascertained by decree or judgment of any Court whose jurisdiction is competent to determine the right, there the production of such decree or judgment by the person in whose favour it may have been made, or the order of the Court consequent thereon, will alone be sufficient to authorise the registrar to register the ownership of such person, subject to the necessity of making such declaration and serving such notices as above adverted to.

"57. Registration, with immediate statutory title, will take place in those cases where the owner of land desires not only to obtain a title which, with regard to the future, will be manifested and established by the register alone, but a title which, with regard to the past, cannot be disturbed. In this class of cases it will be lawful for the parties seeking registration with the benefits of a warranted ownership to apply to the registrar to have the title investigated with that object. In such cases it will be right that the registrar should cause the title to be fully investigated, at the expense of the parties, by counsel and solicitors; and if he shall be satisfied, on their advice, that the title is a good one, then, on the payment of a small premium, to be calculated by way of a per-centage upon the estimated value of the property in question, he will register the ownership as a warranted one, either in the name of the party applying, or, if the party applying shall prefer it, then in the name of such persons as he may nominate for that purpose. Since the guarantie of the title will be given by a public officer, the premiums payable by the party obtaining such guarantie will be paid into the Exchequer; and the Consolidated Fund will be liable to make a fair and reasonable compensation to any person who may, within the period allowed by law, establish a claim in respect of the estate the title to which has thus been registered with a warranted ownership. A similar provision will also be extended to those cases where land is sold under the decree of a Court, subject to the payment of similar premiums, and to the title being examined and approved of in a similar manner.

"58. In both the above cases, for the convenience of parties, as evidence of their title to the property registered, and for other purposes, a certificate of the fact that it has been registered will be delivered by the registrar to the party applying; and this certificate, duly authenticated by the seal of the office, will be a certificate either of warranted or unwarranted ownership, as the case may be. It will be advisable that this certificate should state on the face of it the name of the registered owner, the lands registered, and the incumbrances, if any, to which they are subject. It will also contain a reference to the indexes which relate to the entry thereof in the books of the registry.

"59. The general effect of the kind of registration here recommended will be, that for the purposes of transfer the registered ownership will at all times represent the fee-simple of the property, and as such it will not be capable of any subdivision or modification into partial or limited estates or interests, except so far as charges and leases may also be admitted to the benefit of registration under the provisions which we shall presently mention.

"60. The right to dispose of and transfer the ownership of land in fee, including the right to charge and lease the same, will belong and be incident to, and in fact be taken as forming part of, the registered ownership.

"61. When the registered ownership has not been warranted, it will be subject to such rights and interests as existed in, or were capable of attaching upon, the property at the time of the first registration, but it will not be subject to any rights or interests arising or created at any period subsequent to the time when the first registry was effected, except charges and leases admitted to the register, and except interests protected by caveat or inhibition, as afterwards mentioned. Thenceforward the title to the property, for the purposes of transfer, will be manifested by the register, and by that alone; and so eventually the only title to land which a purchaser need examine will be the last transfer, as the same is recorded in the registrar's books. At the commencement, indeed, the validity of the title of the first registered owner will still depend, as it does now, on the validity of the party by whom the transfer has been made. But as time passes on this title will gradually strengthen itself, until it has reached a period which, under the operation of the Statute of Limitations, will make it complete, and mature it into an unimpeachable statutory title. Year by year the purchaser will be brought nearer and nearer to this result, and so the expenses which attend the retrospective investigation of title will be gradually diminished, until they reach their minimum point.

"62. When the registered ownership is a warranted ownership, the special advantages to be derived from this system of registration will immediately follow. In such cases the registered ownership will be subject only to other registered rights, and will be exempt at once from all latent claims and interests which may have been created previously to the time when the property is registered. The registered owner will, therefore, have forthwith, for the purposes of transfer, a simple, complete, and indefeasible title.

"63. The registered ownership, whether warranted or otherwise, will at all times represent, for the purposes of transfer, what is usually known as the fee-simple, subject to such charges and leases as may be admitted to the register, and, in the case of ownership not warranted, to the title antecedent to the first registration. In other words, the register will be a substitute for the documentary or parchment title. But the registered ownership, whether warranted or otherwise, will remain subject, as the fee-simple now is, first, to such other rights as are not usually included in the abstract of title—that is to say, those rights which are incident to the property in a physical rather than a legal sense, and those which are presumed to attach on all landed property; and, secondly, also to such rights as may be ascertained by inspection on the land itself, or by inquiry of the occupier. Under the first of these heads we include all easements, such as rights of water, rights of way, rights of sporting, and rights to light, and those interests which are denominated in law profits à prendre, and tithe rent-charges, land-tax, and other taxes and rates of a general character. Under the second we include short leases at rack-rent, where the lessee is in actual occupation of the premises. These are rights which are commonly evidenced by known usage or continued enjoyment, or may be ascertained on the spot by inspection or inquiry; and the title to them is generally so independent of the documentary title to the property that they will necessarily form a partial exception to that which will constitute the registered ownership, whether warranted or not."

"66. Where the parties to a settlement desire it, they will have the power of registering the property in the names of two or more persons as registered owners, with a short note, (the words 'No survivorship' will be sufficient), intimating that in the case of the death of either, the jus accrescendi is not to have place. The effect of this will be, that if one of the registered owners die, no alteration of the ownership can be made until his place is filled up. And as the prevailing instances of fraudulent or improper alienation of stock are those where it has devolved upon one trustee, this simple provision (which will completely prevent the devolution of the registered ownership upon a smaller number of persons than those first registered) will operate as an almost perfect protection to all parties who have or may have any kind of interest in the registered land under any settlement of which the registered owners are trustees.

"67. As a further protection, those parties who are entitled to any unregistered interest, which, as the law now stands, would render their concurrence necessary in a sale of the fee, will be at liberty to enter in the registry a caveat or inhibition against the transfer of the registered ownership. The caveat or inhibition may and ought to be of various kinds, or various in its operation, so as to adapt itself to the different circumstances under which it will be required. To prevent abuse, it will be lodged at the register office, only under proper sanctions, such as the consent of the registered owner, or the order of the Court of Chancery if the registered owner improperly refuse to give his consent; and to secure protection suited to the various conditions of settlements, the caveat or inhibition will be allowed to be so framed as to prohibit the transfer of the registered ownership either for a time specified, or during particular lives, or until the occurrence of a stated event, or without the concurrence of certain parties who for that purpose may be named or referred to as protectors, or under any other condition conformable to law which the parties themselves may think fit to impose."

"69. Where the registered owner shall be a person named such for the purposes of any settlement, then, as between such registered owner and the beneficiaries interested under the settlement, he will not be at liberty to retain the registered ownership, or to remain on the register as registered owner for any longer period or under any other circumstances than according to the present rules of courts of equity he would be entitled to retain the legal estate as if he were a trustee of the fee upon trusts similar to the provisions contained in such settlement, and he will be bound to make a grant of the registered ownership to such person as may be named in that behalf by the beneficiaries.

"70. In order to keep up the chain of title, and to prevent the difficulty which might arise upon the death of any registered owner in obtaining a transfer, we think it will be convenient that for the purposes of this measure, as well as for the purposes suggested by the Chancery Commissioners, a real representative should be appointed, upon whom the registered ownership shall devolve. This representative will be ordinarily the executor; but where an executor has not been named, or where he has died or renounced probate, power will be given to the parties interested to apply to the registrar or to a judge to supply the place of the deceased registered owner, and to enter the name of some proper person in his stead."

"72. Registered transferees without valuable consideration will be subject to the claims of the persons interested in the unregistered ownership, in the same manner as their transferor would have been; but this can be so provided for as not to affect registered purchasers from volunteers without fraud; and a further provision can be added, that it shall not be necessary to inquire whether the registered owner acquired his title as a purchaser or not.

"73. We propose that fraud in obtaining a transfer of the registered ownership shall defeat the title of the person who becomes registered owner by fraud, but that notice of unregistered rights shall not, merely as notice, have any such effect. We think that, though the purchaser in the course of his inquiries, or before he concludes the purchase, has notice of any claims upon the estate, it will not be unjust to deprive the parties interested in such claims of their rights in favour of such purchaser, if their rights are not protected upon the register."

BILL IN PROGRESS.

ABSTRACT OF A BILL

To make better Provision for the Punishment of Frauds committed by Trustees, Bankers, and other Persons intrusted with Property.

Preamble.

Sect. 1. Whosoever, being a trustee of any property for the benefit, either wholly or partially, of some other person, shall, in violation of good faith, and with intent to defraud, appropriate, convert, destroy, dispose of, or employ such property, or any part thereof, to or for his own benefit, use, or purposes, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.

2. Whosoever, being a banker, merchant, broker, attorney, or agent, and being intrusted as such with the property of any other person, shall, in violation of good faith, and with intent to defraud, sell, negotiate, transfer, pledge, or in any manner convert or employ to or for his own use such property, or any part thereof, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.

3. Any person intrusted with any power of attorney for the sale or transfer of any property, who shall fraudulently sell, transfer, and convert such property, or any part thereof, to his own use or benefit, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.

4. Whosoever, being a bailee of any property, shall fraudulently take or convert the same to his own use, or the use of any person other than the owner thereof, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.

5. Whosoever, being a director, member, or public officer of any body corporate or public company, shall fraudulently take or apply for his own use any of the money or other property of such body corporate or public company, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.

6. Whosoever, being a director, public officer, or manager of any body corporate or public company, shall receive or possess himself of any of the money or other property of such body corporate or public company otherwise than in payment of a just debt or demand, and shall wilfully omit to make, or cause or direct to be made, a full and true entry thereof in the books and accounts of such body corporate or public company, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.

7. If any director, manager, public officer, or member of any body corporate or public company shall wilfully destroy, alter, mutilate, or falsify any of the books, papers, writings, or securities belonging to the body corporate or public company of which he is a director or manager, public officer or member, or make or be privy to the making of any false or fraudulent entry, or any fraudulent omission, in any book of account or other document, with intent to defraud the shareholders, creditors, or other persons interested in the property or effects of such body corporate or public company, every director so offending shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour.

8. Whosoever, being a director, manager, or public officer of any body corporate or public company, shall wilfully make, circulate, or publish, or concur in wilfully making, circulating, or publishing, any written statement or account which he shall know to be false in any material particular, with intent to deceive or defraud any member, shareholder, or creditor of such body corporate or public company, or with intent to induce any person to become a shareholder or partner therein, or to intrust or advance any money or property to such body corporate or public company, or to enter into any security for the benefit thereof, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.

9. Every person found guilty of an offence under this act shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years, or to suffer such other punishment, by fine or imprisonment, or by both, as the court shall award.

10. Nothing in this act contained shall enable or entitle any person to refuse to make a full and complete discovery by answer to any bill in equity, or to answer any question or interrogatory in any civil proceeding in any court of law or equity, or in the courts of bankruptcy or insolvency; but no answer to any such bill, question, or interrogatory shall be admissible in evidence against such person in any proceeding under this act.

11. Nothing in this act contained, nor any proceeding, conviction, or judgment to be had or taken thereon against any person under this act, shall prevent, lessen, or impeach any remedy at law or in equity which any party aggrieved by any offence against this act might have had if this act had not been passed; but no conviction of any such offender shall be received in evidence in any action at law or suit in equity against him.

12. No prosecution shall be commenced without the sanction of some judge or the Attorney-General.

14. Costs of prosecutions.

16. Interpretation clause.

17. This act shall not extend to Scotland.

100 Shares in the Law Fire Insurance Society, in Lots.

MR. DEBENHAM has received instructions to SELL by AUCTION, at the Mart, on THURSDAY, June 18, at 12, (unless previously disposed of by private treaty), ONE HUNDRED SHARES in that far-famed COMPANY the LAW FIRE. It is needless to state that the business is of the very highest order, and is yearly rapidly increasing. The extreme prudence of the management is proverbial: it is conducted by the most eminent members of the Profession, some of the Judges of the land are the trustees of its funds, and it is impossible to estimate the magnitude of the eventual dividend and value of these shares. There is an enormous undivided "Rest," the division of a part of which, by way of bonus to the shareholders, must one day take place. This investment for small sums is confidently recommended to the earnest consideration of members of the Legal Profession, whose powerful interest exerted for this institution may be expected to make its shares equal the almost fabulous value of those of the County or Sun Fire Offices, the fortunes made in which investments are too well known to require comment. At the General Meeting, on the 26th May last, a dividend and bonus were declared amounting to 10*l.* per cent. on the paid-up capital.—Particulars are now ready, and may be obtained at the Mart, and at Mr. Debenham's Offices, 80, Cheapside.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, JUNE 13, 1857.

There are few questions of greater importance to the administration of justice in this country than the constitution of the appellate jurisdiction, both of intermediate courts and those of the last resort, viz. the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and the House of Lords.

The important debate upon this subject in the House of Lords has just been published, and shews us in what light the jurisdiction of their own House is viewed by the Peers of the realm, and the remedies which they propose for the evils they either candidly admit or faintly deny.

In this debate some expressions are made use of by a noble lord* which we think have a tendency to create an erroneous notion as to the proper functions of a court of justice. The power of deciding appeals in the last resort is termed by Lord Derby "a privilege" of the House of Lords. "I consider it," he says, "undoubtedly to be a very high privilege, and a most important privilege, and as regards the legal members of your Lordships' House it undoubtedly does vest in them, as being such members, a very important and responsible jurisdiction; and even with regard to the House of Lords at large, I am not prepared to say, though substantially the authority is not practically vested in them, that the apparent semblance of that authority is not in itself a real source of power, of which I should be sorry to see your Lordships deprived."

Now, where the people have a right to resort to a tribunal for justice, it seems rather to be the duty than the privilege of that tribunal to administer justice; and when the jurisdiction is spoken of "as a source of power," that may be a good reason why the House of Lords should be strongly influenced in their desire to retain it, but none why the people at large, for whose use alone tribunals of justice exist, should not remodel, or, if necessary, entirely abolish, the present appellate jurisdiction of the highest resort.

In what respect, then, is the House of Lords, as a court of appeal, deficient? This may, perhaps, be best shewn by a few examples.

Take the present state of the Court of Chancery. Suppose that a case has been heard before one of the Vice-Chancellors or the Master of the Rolls; the parties, or some of them, are not satisfied with the decree. They appeal. It depends merely upon chance whether the appeal will be heard before a single judge, viz. the Lord Chancellor—before two, viz. the Lord Chancellor and one of the Lords Justices, or the two Lords Justices—or before three, viz. the Lord Chancellor and the two Lords Justices. The next and final step, if the decree made is still unsatisfactory, is an appeal to the House of Lords—a tribunal of which few of the people of this country, except lawyers, have a very distinct notion. Now, although it is the privilege of all or any of the lords to attend upon appeals, the only lord, even among the law lords, whose duty it is to be there in a judicial capacity is the Lord Chancellor; although, in order to obtain a quorum of the House, in the absence of other law lords, he is assisted by the corporeal presence of other noble lords not learned in the law, who attend by rotation in order to make up a House, and take no other part in the proceedings. These noble lords, who attend upon such occasions in exercise of the privilege of the House, have been appropriately described by Lord Derby as being "rather like the lay figures which are introduced in a painter's studio for the purpose of adding to the completeness of the judicial tableau; and in this case certainly they do not perform the part of adding any grace or any force to the tout ensemble of the picture in which they appear*." Now, although the Lord Chancellor often is, and it may be said generally is, assisted by the gratuitous services of other law lords, he may be, and sometimes is, obliged to hear and determine appeals from English or Scottish tribunals consisting of several judges, while he is surrounded, though not assisted, by the presence and countenance of noble lords whom Lord Derby has designated "lay figures."

Another great evil is, that a noble lord may sit, even alone, to decide upon an appeal from himself. Suppose a case has been heard by one of the Vice-Chancellors or the Master of the Rolls, it is then reversed by the Lord Chancellor: if an appeal is then brought to the House of Lords, the duty of hearing it may devolve upon the Lord Chancellor alone; and it is supposed by some, that hearing an appeal from his own judgment, reversing that of another judge, he will be capable of giving an opinion totally unbiased by what has already taken place. Without, perhaps, going so far as a noble lord, who in the introductory chapter to one of his learned and able works has stated such a proceeding to be, in his opinion, "an appeal from Philip sober to Philip drunk†," we may at any rate observe, that it is of the highest importance, not only that a judge should sit down to decide a case with the most perfect intention of doing what is right, but that there should not be ground for a shadow of suspicion that any preconceived or already expressed opinions, such as most men naturally and almost necessarily feel upon such occasions, should in the slightest degree influence the mind of an appellate judge. But can it be predicated of a judge sitting alone on an appeal from himself, especially when by his own decree he has already reversed that of another judge? We have heard of a pope who passed sentence upon himself for heresy—"Judico me cremari, et crematus est, et sanctus fuit." Self-cremation among popes and among lawyers (who pretend not to be saints) is rare, though perhaps not quite so rare as a reversal by a judge of a court of appeal of his own decree in a court below. Lord Eldon certainly in the House of Lords reversed one of his own judgments. The statistics on the subject would be interesting, and perhaps instructive. Be this as it may, the principle which the House of Lords has so righteously and so inflexibly laid down, that a judge possessing an interest, however remote, in the subject-matter of a suit "shall not be judge in his own cause‡," applies with equal if not with greater force where (to use the words of one perhaps of all others best qualified to give a sound opinion) "the judge is actuated by the strongest possible motives—the passion of self-love—to support his own previous judgment*."

Suppose, again, another case which may occur. An appeal is brought from the decision of the Master of the Rolls, before the Lords Justices, or before the Lords Justices and the Lord Chancellor: suppose in both cases the decree to be affirmed, in the last case contrary to the opinion of the Lord Chancellor; the appeal to the House of Lords might be heard by the Lord Chancellor alone, and he, a single judge, might reverse the decision of three other judges, like himself, of the highest eminence; and in the second case supposed, having almost necessarily an inclination to do so in favour of judicial opinion already expressed, but overruled in a court below. Take the recent case of Jorden v. Money; that was heard first by the Master of the Rolls, who decided in favour of the plaintiff; it was afterwards heard by the Lords Justices—Lord Justice Knight Bruce and the present Lord Chancellor—and Lord Justice Knight Bruce, differing from Lord Cranworth, agreeing with the decision of the Master of the Rolls, the decree was affirmed. On appeal to the House of Lords, Lord Cranworth retained the opinion he expressed in the court below, in which he was supported by Lord Brougham, Lord St. Leonards being strongly of opinion that the decree of the Court below ought to have been affirmed. The consequence was, the decree was reversed. The opinion, therefore, of three judges—Sir John Romilly, Lord Justice Knight Bruce, and Lord St. Leonards—was overruled by the opinion of two, viz. the Lord Chancellor and Lord Brougham.

Lord St. Leonards, indeed, in his able speech in the House of Lords†, seems to think that the objection to the Lord Chancellor sitting on an appeal from a decree of his own is got rid of when he gets the assistance of other learned lords, or of the judges; but the same motives which he so forcibly expresses in the work we have already mentioned would still operate; and although he may not have the decision entirely in his own hands, he counts one, and the question of reversal or affirmance may turn upon his decision. Thus, if there had been a rule to the effect that a judge could never sit upon an appeal from a case heard before himself in another court, the decree of the Court below in Jorden v. Money, the opinions of the House of Lords being evenly divided, would have stood unreversed. The remarks we have made with reference to the Court of Chancery are not altogether applicable either to appeals from the Courts of common law or the Scotch Courts; but there is this evil inherent in the jurisdiction of the House of Lords, that a single judge may reverse the well-considered judgment of a numerous and well-constituted tribunal (even with reference, to the latter courts) upon matters of law or practice with which he is not necessarily familiar.

We may sum up the principal objections to the jurisdiction as at present exercised in cases of appeal by the House of Lords as follows:—First, that as the attendance of the law lords is, with the exception of the Lord Chancellor, gratuitous and optional, the House may be represented by a much smaller number of judges than the Court from which the appeal is brought, perhaps even by a single judge. Secondly, the judge who is necessarily present may sit on appeals from his own judgments, not necessarily even assisted by other judges. Thirdly, the House of Lords sits for only half the year, and consequently during the remaining half year there is, so far as the House is concerned, a denial of justice to the subject. And, lastly, in the case of Scotch appeals, it is a tribunal inadequate properly to decide them. These objections we propose to consider somewhat fully hereafter, and to make some observations on the Report of the Lords' Committee, and the proposed bill founded upon it, which, together with some very valuable remarks of his own in the notes, Mr. Macqueen has published with the debate on the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords. It is a subject not recently noticed in Parliament, but one which, as it is of importance to the country at large, should not be allowed to drop. Perhaps, in rendering the House of Lords, as it may possibly be, a supreme court of appeal worthy of this country, what Lord Derby is pleased to call the "privileges" of the Peers may not be found altogether inconsistent with the wants and rights of the people.

In the case of The Attorney-General v. Calvert, (3 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 500), the Master of the Rolls enunciated several important principles relating to the construction of bequests for charitable, educational, and religious objects. An information had been filed by the Attorney-General upon the relation of some of the inhabitants of Hadleigh, in Suffolk, praying an account of various charities, and that it might be declared that persons dissenting from the Church of England (but in other respects proper objects of the charities) were entitled to participate in the benefits of them.

Dr. Pykenham, in the reign of Henry VII, had founded twelve almshouses in Hadleigh for twenty-four poor persons, and had appointed the parson and wardens of the parish-church trustees for the purpose of administering this charity. A chapel was attached to the almshouses, and the founder's will contained this clause—"I will that every holyday in the year from henceforth for evermore the bell in the chappell be tolled every forenoon at eight o'clock, and in the afternoon at four, by one of the said poor men which now is inhabiting and hereafter shall be in that house next unto the chappell on that side next to the parish church . . . and then, without any delay, every one of the said twenty-four poor men and women shall daily resort into the chappell, and there shall continue and remain in prayer every forenoon from eight unto nine, unless that a lawful and reasonable cause, as sickness, impotency, or such other duty, prove lett to the contrary; and that all and every one of them devoutly say every morning, in the hour afore limited, in the same chappell, fifteen pater nosters and fifteen aves, with the creed, so that every one of them in one whole year so continuing may worship all the wounds that our Saviour Christ Jesus suffered for the redemption of sinful man; and over that, those that are learned shall say Mattins Primal and Hours of our Lady, and also the psalm of De Profundis, and once in the week, at their best leisure, the seven Psalms and the Litany, and placebo and dirge for the souls of William Pykenham, their founder . . . . and for all Christian souls." Then followed a power of expulsion for misbehaviour, or for disobedience to the above directions.

There was likewise a bequest of bread to be distributed by the rector and churchwardens to such as attended the church; and it appeared that dissenters had been excluded from both charities.

Upon these facts the Master of the Rolls laid down and applied the following rules:—

First, the intentions of the founder are to be carried into effect as far as they are capable of being so, and so far as they are not contrary to law, using the word "law" in its proper and widest signification, as including the precepts of religion and morality.

Secondly, if the charity be founded to support some religious establishment, or if it seek to promote religious education, (as in the case of Lady Hewley's Charity, 9 Cl. & Fin. 335), and if the intentions of the founder be not clearly expressed, or if the instrument of foundation be lost, or never had any existence, the opinions and religious tenets of the founder have a most material bearing on the question of who are the objects of the charity, and in what manner the trusts of it are to be performed. In these cases the presumption, in the first instance, is, that the founder intended to support an establishment belonging to some particular form of religion, and that he intended some particular doctrine of religion to be taught. The next presumption is, that this doctrine was that which he himself supported and professed.

Thirdly, when a charity has been founded for the purposes of secular education, the Court will not, in the absence of expressed intention, assume that the founder intended any particular religious doctrine to be combined with the secular education; but on the contrary, will assume that the object was for secular instruction generally, and will not, by enforcing particular rules relative to religious instruction, prevent all denominations of Christians from obtaining the benefit of the instruction.

Fourthly, where the charity is one of a purely eleemosynary character, the presumption that all classes were intended to participate in the bounty of the founder is so strong, that it requires a clear and distinct expression of unequivocal import to exclude any class of dissenters from the benefits of the charity. Such expression must be found in the instrument of foundation, or, at all events, in immemorial usage, the burthen of proof being thrown on those who seek to exclude. "No doctrine of law or precept of religion," said the learned judge, "establishes that the act of relieving a fellow-creature from the privations or calamities which have befallen him ought to be preceded by ascertaining that he holds opinions in accordance with the true doctrines of Christ as promulgated in the Gospel, or with those which the donor believes to be such."

In conformity with these principles, the Master of the Rolls decided, in the case before him, that dissenters were not excluded from the benefits of the almshouses, if they could conscientiously comply with the directions of the founder, modified by the Reformation and subsequent statutes, and that the trustees could not examine whether they did so sincerely, or whether they were members of the Church of England. With regard to the distribution of bread, it was held that regularity of attendance at church was all that was necessary to entitle the poor to participate in the bounty.

PETITION OF THE PROCTORS OF DOCTORS' COMMONS

AGAINST THE MATRIMONIAL AND TESTAMENTARY JURISDICTION BILLS.

A petition, signed by eighty-seven Proctors of Doctors' Commons, has been presented to the House of Lords, claiming the continuance of their exclusive privileges, or compensation, of which the following is the substance:—

That the office of Proctor is of great antiquity, having been recognised as early as the year 1236, and having been regulated by the canons of 1603; and that the duties of those holding the said office have been expressly regulated by statute; and, amongst other acts, by the acts 3 Jac. 1, c. 5, and 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, of which the last mentioned made express provision for the protection of Proctors, and confirmed and guaranteed them in the enjoyment of exclusive practice.

That under these several regulations and acts of Parliament your petitioners exercise the right of practice in the Ecclesiastical Courts of England, in which are transacted the larger portion of the business relating to the grants of probates of wills and letters of administration, and in which the larger portion of matrimonial causes have hitherto been heard and determined—a right of practice which the Parliament of England has handed down and guaranteed to your petitioners for nearly seven centuries, with exclusive rights and privileges.

That to acquire their exclusive right of practice under the authority of the acts of Parliament aforesaid your petitioners have paid large sums of money on being articled and admitted; have served under articles for seven years; and, at a further large expense and sacrifice, have become notaries public. That many of your petitioners have also paid large sums of money, or have laid themselves under heavy pecuniary obligations, for the purchase of their practices, or are under engagements to pay annuities to former practitioners, or to the widows of deceased partners, or have made family arrangements dependent on the continuance of the present practice, and under the assurance of acts of Parliament by which the same was guaranteed to them.

That the above-mentioned bills now pending in your Right Honourable House would operate most injuriously, and in some instances will be utterly destructive of the professional practice of your petitioners, and may in many instances interfere with the afore-mentioned obligations and arrangements, thereby involving many other persons besides your petitioners in the difficulties and hardships which these measures may inflict if passed into law in their present shape.

That under the 42nd clause of the Probate and Letters of Administration Bill all solicitors and attornies are to be admitted to practise in all contentious matters in the courts in which your petitioners have hitherto had exclusive practice. That the effect of such an enactment would be to deprive your petitioners of a large portion of such contentious practice, without any compensation or corresponding boon.

That by the 43rd clause of the said bill registrars of district courts, some of which are to be newly constituted, are empowered to grant probates and letters of administration in cases where the property may be under 1500*l.*—a measure which would deprive your petitioners of the largest portion of their practice in all non-contentious business, inasmuch as the number of grants of probate and letters of administration under that sum amount to at least seventy-nine per cent. of the entire number granted annually.

That by the 89th clause of the same bill any business that may remain to any of your petitioners will be subject to still further diminution of profit, the said clause being so constructed as to repeal all that portion of the 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, whereby the office of Proctor was made and guaranteed to be an independent and exclusive office, and proposing instead thereof to place the Proctors in the position of agents to attornies and solicitors, in relation to all matters testamentary.

That by clause 40 of the same bill any Proctor of any Ecclesiastical Court is entitled to be admitted a Proctor of the Court of Probate—a provision under which your petitioners' exclusive privileges would be still further prejudiced, inasmuch as a numerous class of practitioners in minor courts, who have gained their present status by shorter terms of service and cheaper means, would be permitted to practise in those courts in which your petitioners enjoy at the present time exclusive right of practice.

That by the same section (sect. 40) the transaction of business in all district registries of the Court of Probate may hereafter be thrown open to "any person," or to "any class or classes of persons," at the discretion of any judge of the court who may "think fit to make any rule or order of the Court to such effect"—an enactment which, your petitioners submit, would be without any valid precedent, and would speedily be so construed as to be destructive of any privileges remaining to your petitioners.

That at the present time a limited number of the senior Proctors possess the exclusive privilege of taking articled clerks—a privilege which those of your petitioners who have not already acquired the same will acquire in due course by seniority. That such advantage, whether in possession or prospect, will be lost to all your petitioners should these bills pass into law as they now stand, inasmuch as all attornies and solicitors will have the right of practice in contentious suits, and their clerks, from their admission, will be entitled to many of the exclusive privileges now enjoyed by your petitioners.

That your petitioners desire to represent to your Right Honourable House that the effect of these measures will be not only to deprive your petitioners of their privileges, but unjustly and causelessly to degrade them from the position of officers of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and of independent practitioners in an honourable profession, to that of mere agents of attornies and solicitors; and they humbly submit to the consideration of your Lordships that such an arrangement is neither calculated to benefit the jurisdiction or the public, inasmuch as it permits that which the act 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, was expressly devised to prevent, namely, a system under which practice was secured to certain firms, by large "allowances" made to attornies and solicitors out of charges levied on the suitors.

That your petitioners further desire to submit, that whilst the present number of Proctors exercising exclusive right is no more than 114, the attornies and solicitors who will be entitled to share their practice, should these bills pass into law, number upwards of 10,000; and they especially solicit your Lordships' attention to the fact, that whilst your petitioners have paid, and continue to pay, large sums of money for the purpose of securing the practice they possess, the bills before your Lordships contain no provisions whereby any payment of any sort is required from the numerous body proposed to be admitted to share their practice, either in the shape of contribution to the revenue of the State, or of contribution to any fund which might hereafter be made available for the purposes of compensation to those who will suffer from these proposed enactments.

And your petitioners would further humbly represent that no substantial reasons can be shewn for the extinction or withdrawal of any of the privileges your petitioners enjoy on the faith and by virtue of the confirmation of several acts of Parliament. That no imputation or suggestion has at any time been made of any want of competency efficiently to conduct the business of the courts to which these bills relate. That, on the contrary, the evidence of the highest authority attests your petitioners' professional skill, their intimate acquaintance with the laws applicable to marriage questions and testamentary jurisdiction, as well as the undeniable character of the exclusive rights of which these bills would deprive them, without any compensation.

And your petitioners further submit, that it would be opposed to the equity of Parliament to subject your petitioners, for whatsoever object, to the penalties and personal individual losses these measures would inflict. They submit to your Lordships, that in the report of her Majesty's commissioners appointed to inquire into the practice "of the Court of Chancery, and the law and jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical and other courts in relation to matters testamentary," it was expressly declared by her Majesty's commissioners, that "in common justice to the Proctors compensation should be made to them if their business is thrown open;" and your petitioners further submit, that the justice and equity of this report has been repeatedly acknowledged, and more especially in a bill submitted to Parliament on this subject in the Session 1855 by her Majesty's then Attorney-General, Sir Alexander Cockburn, her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State, the Right Hon. Sir George Grey, and by her Majesty's then Solicitor and now Attorney-General, Sir Richard Bethell, on behalf of her Majesty's present Government.

Your petitioners therefore humbly pray your Right Honourable House to take the premises into your consideration, and to introduce such provisions into the before-mentioned bills as will continue to your petitioners the sole exclusive right of practice hitherto enjoyed by them in all the testamentary and matrimonial courts, or as will secure to them and to their families just and adequate compensation for the losses which will be inflicted on them should the proposed bills pass into law as they now stand.

EXAMINATIONS AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

TRINITY TERM, 1857.

At the examination of candidates for admission on the roll of attornies and solicitors of the superior courts, the examiners considered the following gentlemen as the only candidates under the age of twenty-six who deserved honorary distinction of the first class:—

Edward Balden, of Birmingham, who served his clerkship to Mr. Samuel Balden, of Birmingham, and Messrs. Hughes, Kearsey, Masterman, & Hughes, of 17, Bucklersbury, London.

The Council of the Incorporated Law Society have accordingly awarded a prize of books to each of those candidates.

The examiners have also certified that the following candidates passed examinations very little inferior to those who have been reported for prizes:—

1. Joseph Fallows, jun., of 198, Piccadilly, London, who served his clerkship to Mr. Joseph Fallows, of 198, Piccadilly.

1. William Stewart Forster, of Lewisham, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Frere, Goodford, & Cholmeley, of Lincoln's Inn.

By order of the Council,
Robert Maugham, Secretary.

Law Society's Hall, June 4, 1857.

Imperial Parliament.

WILLS OF BRITISH SUBJECTS ABROAD.

In consequence of the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Bremer v. Freeman, (noticed in a previous number), Sir Fitzroy Kelly has introduced into the House of Commons a bill to render valid for all purposes the wills of British subjects, although they may be domiciled abroad at the time of their death. As the subject is one of considerable importance, we give the substance of the debate upon it on Tuesday last:—

Sir F. Kelly said, that if a British subject, after making his will in strict conformity with the law, went permanently to reside in any foreign country or colony, the law of which differed from the law of this country, the result would be, that after death his will would be set aside and his intentions defeated; his property would pass to the next of kin, or whoever according to the law of the foreign country would be entitled to it. Any subject of the realm, it was well known, might make his will, provided it were executed by himself and attested by two witnesses, disposing of his whole estate, real and personal; but this law, allowing an Englishman to dispose of his property at his own free will and pleasure, was most unduly controlled by certain decisions pronounced by courts of law, which had introduced a state of things which, in his humble opinion, loudly called for remedy. As an instance he would mention the case of an Irish gentleman, who in the year 1827 was residing in Portugal, and in order to protect his property there, had become naturalised. That gentleman died leaving property both in Portugal and Ireland. With regard to the property in Portugal, he had executed a will according to the form required by the Portuguese law; but in order to dispose of his personal property in Ireland, he had sent for an English attorney to execute a will according to the English form, and that will was executed in strict conformity with English law. The property thus bequeathed was left partly to a legitimate son and partly to a natural child; and after the death of the testator, upon probate being applied for, the application was opposed by the legitimate son, who insisted that the will was void in law, because it had not been made according to the law of Portugal, in which country he insisted that his father had become domiciled. Now, the question of a foreign domicil was one which always gave rise to the most serious difficulties. Whether a person went to a place animo manendi or animo revertendi was always a difficult thing to prove, and all kinds of witnesses—chambermaids, servants, &c.—had to be brought forward to repeat all that they had ever heard with respect to the intentions of the persons whose domicil became a matter of dispute. In the case of Stanley v. Bernes the learned judge who tried the case laid down the dictum, that persons who remained under the liabilities of British subjects ought to retain also any advantage which that position might give them, and he pronounced in favour of a will executed abroad by a British subject according to the forms of the English law. That decision had, however, subsequently been overruled. In the case of Collier v. Rivas a British subject had acquired a domicil in Brussels, and made a will according to the English form. It was held in that case, that although the testator had acquired a domicil in Brussels, yet by the Code Napoleon it was provided that a testator might make his will according to the law and form established in the country of which he was a subject. That had continued in force until very lately. In the year 1852 a lady named Calcraft, who had been travelling about the continent, ultimately went to Paris, and resided there for some time with her sister, who afterwards died, and was buried in Père le Chaise. The surviving sister remained some time in France, and while residing there sent to England for an attorney of eminence to make her will. The lady had died a few years subsequently, and the executors of her will had applied for probate in the Prerogative Court in this country. The granting of probate had, however, been opposed on the ground that the will was void, inasmuch as at the time at which it had been drawn up the testatrix had been domiciled in France. The answer to that objection had been, that in accordance with the French law itself the instrument was valid; and in order to establish that proposition a great deal of evidence had been adduced, and the case had been submitted to the consideration of no less than five of the most eminent French jurists, who had arrived at the conclusion that the will was valid, and, as a consequence, entitled to probate. Three eminent French lawyers had, however, come to an opposite decision, stating it to be their opinion that the instrument, in order to be of force, should have been drawn up in accordance with the law of France. They had gone even so far as to maintain that if the lady had not been permanently domiciled in France, but had merely taken up her residence there temporarily, the rule lex loci regit actum would prevail, and that her will, though framed in strict accordance with the law of her own country, would still be ineffectual. The question had finally been submitted to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and they had given a decision different from that which had been pronounced in the case of Collier v. Rivas, maintaining that the will must, in accordance with English law, be held to be invalid. Now, since he had given notice of the motion which he was about to submit to the House, he had received numerous letters from British subjects resident in Paris and elsewhere, and from attornies practising in various parts of France, upon the subject; and he felt bound to say, that neither in those letters, nor from the communications which he had held with several members of the legal Profession in this country, had he been able to ascertain a shadow of a reason why the will of a British subject, executed in compliance with the forms which English law required to be observed in the framing of such instruments, was to be regarded as invalid because the testator happened to reside in Paris or at Constantinople. One of the most mischievous results of the existing system was, that in every case in which probate of the will of a British subject domiciled abroad was sought to be obtained, and the validity of the instrument was disputed, it became necessary, besides establishing that the testator was of sound mind and had complied with the necessary formalities, to resort to that most perplexing and expensive process of endeavouring to ascertain where the testator had been domiciled at the time when the will had been executed. That was a feature in these cases which had of late years led to a greater amount of litigation than any other with which he was acquainted. In the case of Lord Hereford, for instance, it had been proved that he had resided in France for some time, that he had afterwards gone to Milan, thence to Naples, and subsequently he had been domiciled in more than one of the German States. Now, in order to establish the validity of a will made under such circumstances, it became necessary to inquire into the law, not of one alone, but of all those several countries; and the House, he thought, could scarcely fail to be of opinion that the existence of such a state of things was productive of enormous evil. It was in order to provide a remedy for that evil that he proposed, in the bill which he was about to ask for leave to introduce, to enact that all wills, codicils, and testamentary papers executed by a British subject in accordance with the prescribed forms as laid down by the law of England, and duly attested, should be held to be valid in this country, no matter where the testator might have been domiciled at the time at which the instrument happened to have been drawn up; but it was not his intention to interfere with the action of the laws of any foreign State. He might also observe, that the bill contained a proviso, which he had introduced into it after considerable doubt, the object of which was, that the measure should not affect any wills which now formed the subject of judicial investigation, or which, owing to the decease of the testator, were already in full legal operation. Should his bill pass into a law, it would have the effect of restoring that liberty to British subjects of which they had been deprived by a series of decisions, utterly unfounded upon any principle of justice between man and man.

Mr. Malins seconded the motion. The evil which the bill was designed to correct was one of immense magnitude, and he regretted that in the late case of Freeman v. Bremer the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council could not find reasons for coming to an opposite conclusion. The question was, whether, for the disposal of his property, an Englishman dying in a foreign country was to be considered an Englishman or a foreigner. The question of domicil which was raised in such cases was one of the most difficult as well as expensive that could come before the Courts. A case was now going on in the Court of Chancery in which a gentleman, of very large property, of peculiar and eccentric habits, who died four or five years ago, left the bulk of his property, amounting to about 100,000*l*., to found a charity in the town of Southampton. It was supposed at first that the only question for the Court was, whether the words were sufficient to found a charity; but as it appeared he had resided in France for many years, at first at Boulogne and then at Paris, the question arose whether, although his will was made according to the English form, he had not acquired a French domicil. A special examiner was appointed to take the evidence on this subject; and to illustrate the difficulty and expense of these inquiries, he might state, that the examiner had been engaged for fourteen days in England and forty-two in France in taking evidence on the question whether that English gentleman, who had resided in France for a number of years, had not thrown off his English and acquired a French domicil. He was afraid that after the decisions of the Privy Council, declaring some of these wills invalid, it would be going too far to say that the bill should be retrospective in its operation; yet it might be worthy of consideration whether Parliament could not justly go even to this extent, and he should greatly rejoice to see the measure made retrospective if it could be justly done.

The Attorney-General said that the subject to which his hon. and learned friend had invited attention was one of no common importance, and he trusted that it would not be treated by the House as a legal question, but one of general importance, which every member of that House was competent to appreciate and form an opinion upon. He did not intend to oppose the introduction of the bill, because the subject was unquestionably one deserving of discussion; but he must entreat the attention of the House to the difficulties of the subject, and the qualifications with which his vote in favour of leave to introduce the bill must be given. They would all agree with him that it was extremely desirable for the jurisprudence of every country to preserve untouched and unimpaired those maxims of law which were common to the jurisprudence of other countries. Civilised nations were agreed upon one question of perpetual recurrence, and great inconvenience would be occasioned if the rule of one country were contrary to that of another. The origin of the rule that had been impugned by his hon. and learned friend was a general maxim that had prevailed in Europe from the earliest time—namely, from the earliest establishment of the principles of Roman law. That maxim was expressed in the words, "Mobilia sequuntur personam," which meant that the personal estate of the testator accompanied him wherever he might reside and become domiciled, and thence he acquired the right of disposing of it, and dealing with it according to the law of that country. In consequence of that rule of law, if a man died in a foreign country in which he might be domiciled, the distribution of his personal property fell naturally within the jurisdiction of the country in which he was residing at the time of his death. This was a universal rule in civilised Europe, and the judge of the country in which the testator died therefore became the person to determine the question of testacy or intestacy. They could not withdraw the question of testacy and intestacy from the judge without impairing the force of the maxim to which he had referred. If there were a common consent on the part of all the nations of Europe to adopt the rule recommended for England by his hon. and learned friend, there might be less objection to this proposition; but, while there was a want of that common consent, the making of an exceptional experiment in England was much to be deprecated. He (the Attorney-General) was opposed to the introduction into this country of a rule peculiar to itself that would derogate from the universally-recognised maxim of jurisprudence handed down to us through a long succession of ages, and which undoubtedly had the great advantage, that every nation in Europe knew with certainty the principle that governed this particular case. There was an inconvenience which the hon. and learned gentleman's bill would not in the smallest degree touch—he meant the present uncertainty of the law in determining questions of domicil. He agreed that the question of domicil of necessity entered into the application of the rule of jurisprudence to which he had alluded; but the difficulty to which the attention of the Legislature ought to be directed would be the furnishing of a rule by which questions of domicil might be decided, rather than to the making of any attempt to engraft on the jurisprudence of this country an exception to the general maxim above described. Some cases of hardship would always accompany adherence to a general rule; but, on the other hand, would there be no practical inconvenience attending the introduction of exceptional legislation? Assuming that we adopted for ourselves a different rule from that followed by other nations, if a person domiciled in France died possessed of property in the French funds and also in the English funds, the result would be that we should be claiming the right here to give effect to a will operative according to our exceptional law, but of no validity according to the French law; and tenfold the amount of difficulty and inconvenience at present experienced would ensue from the conflict between the institutions of the two countries. Thus the evil which this measure sought to remedy would only be aggravated by its adoption. He regretted that his hon. and learned friend, who had striven with all his great abilities to enforce his views on the Privy Council, but without success, should not have allowed a longer time to elapse before he appealed to that House; because the decision of the Privy Council was in strict conformity with the judgments of all the eminent men on the bench who were qualified to determine the question at issue. It was most inconvenient that a decision, which at the moment naturally appeared to be wrong in the eyes of the advocate against whom it was given, should be brought before Parliament while the excitement to which the subject had given rise still precluded the cool deliberation essential to wise legislation. He was sorry, therefore, that the hon. and learned gentleman proposed to introduce this bill, contemplating, as it did, the establishment in this country of a rule that would not be common to the rest of Europe. It was most desirable, now that the interchange between different countries was so rapid, easy, and general, that there should be as few conflicts between their respective systems of jurisprudence as possible, and that the judgments of the Courts of one nation should be readily accepted by the Courts of another. The Government were not, however, disposed to resist the introduction of the bill, although, for the reasons he had assigned, they could not promise the hon. and learned gentleman their co-operation in passing it through its subsequent stages.

BILL IN PROGRESS.

A BILL

To amend the Act 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, for facilitating the winding up the Affairs of Joint-stock Companies unable to meet their pecuniary Engagements, and also the Joint-stock Companies Winding-up Acts, 1848 and 1849.

Whereas it is expedient to amend the act 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, and also the Joint-stock Companies Winding-up Acts, 1848 and 1849, and also to make provision for the more equal distribution amongst creditors as well of the assets to arise from the separate estates or contributions of shareholders in any company as of the joint assets thereof: be it therefore enacted &c. as follows:—

Sect. 1. In all cases in which an order heretofore has been, or hereafter shall be, made for the dissolution and winding up or for the winding up of any company, it shall be lawful for the judge or master charged with the winding up of any company, at the instance of any creditor of such company or otherwise, in all cases in which it shall appear expedient, and or the benefit of the parties interested, in and by the advertisement for proof of debts required by the 72nd section of the Joint-stock Companies Winding-up Act, 1848, or by subsequent advertisements, or by notice transmitted to each of the creditors by post, as directed by the said two before-mentioned acts, from time to time to call upon the creditors of the company to meet before such judge or master at such time and place as shall be fixed by him, for the purpose of appointing one or more person or persons other than the official manager to represent all the creditors of the said company in and about the said proceedings before him, or in and about so many and such of the same proceedings as to such judge or master shall from time to time seem expedient; and it shall be lawful for two-thirds in value of the creditors present at such meetings, whose debts shall have been proved before the said judge or master, or who shall previously to such meeting have lodged an affidavit of their debt before him, and who would be entitled to vote in the choice of assignees under a bankruptcy, by themselves or by some person authorised by any letter or writing under the hand of such creditor, and which letter or writing shall require no stamp duty to be paid thereon, to choose some person or persons to represent all the creditors of any such company accordingly; and the proceedings of such meeting shall be conducted before and by the said judge or master in the same manner as would be the case if the said creditors were proceeding to the election of assignees in bankruptcy; provided that the said judge or master may reject any person or persons so chosen who shall appear to him unfit to be such representative or representatives, or may remove any such representative or representatives, and upon such rejection or removal a new choice of a representative or representatives shall be made in like manner; and from and after the issuing of any such advertisement as aforesaid all the creditors of the said company shall be deemed parties to the winding up: provided always, that in case such company shall be or have been adjudged bankrupt, the assignees of the estate and effects of such bankrupt company shall be deemed and taken to be, and they are hereby constituted, (without such advertisement or meeting as hereinbefore mentioned), the representatives of the creditors for the purposes of this act, and shall have and exercise the same rights and powers as are hereby given to or vested in such representative or representatives; and provided also, that if any such representative or representatives of the creditors shall have been chosen or appointed in the matter of the winding up of any company before the appointment of assignees under the adjudication of bankruptcy against the same company, then upon such appointment of assignees the rights, powers, and authorities of such representative or representatives shall cease and determine, and the same rights, powers, and authorities shall thereupon become vested in, and may lawfully be had and exercised by, such assignees as aforesaid; and such representative or representatives shall be entitled to his or their reasonable costs in the matter of the winding up of such company.

2. Whenever any such company heretofore has been or hereafter shall be declared bankrupt, and no winding-up order shall have been made, the assignees may, with the leave of the Court of Bankruptcy first obtained, after notice to such creditors, and subject to such condition (if any) as to obtaining the consent of creditors, or any proportion of them, as the said court shall think fit to direct, and whether the whole of the assets of such company shall have been collected or converted or not, and having regard to the sufficiency of the assets of the company for payment of the debts or liabilities of such company, and also to the solvency and means of the several shareholders or members of such company, or any one or more of them, or to such other matters as the said court may deem material, accept and take from all or any or either of the shareholders or members of such company such reasonable sum or sums in discharge and satisfaction of the liability of all and every the shareholders and members, or any or either of them, to the debts and liabilities of such company, in such manner and at such times as the assignees for the time being of the estate of such company shall think fit, or make any other compromise, composition, or other arrangement in the matter; and all such sum or sums as shall be payable thereunder shall be paid to and received by the official assignee, and shall be applied as part of the estate and effects of such company; and the said court shall, at the request of the assignees for the time being of such company, give to the several shareholders and members, or such of them as shall be so discharged, a certificate under the hand and seal of the commissioner, setting forth the circumstances of such discharge, so far as he may deem the same material, and such certificate shall thenceforth operate to all intents and purposes as an absolute release to the shareholders and members to whom the same shall relate, and may be by them pleaded and used in bar and in discharge of any action, execution, or other proceeding by any creditor whose debt or claim is by law proveable under such bankruptcy; and every such shareholder and member shall be entitled, as between himself and the other shareholders or members of the company, and in account with the official manager, if any shall have been appointed, to credit in respect of such sum or sums as shall by such certificate be declared to have been paid by him.

3. It shall be lawful for such representatives or representative as are hereinbefore mentioned to join and concur or take part in all the proceedings in and about the winding up of the said company, or such of the same proceedings as the judge or master shall deem expedient for the interest of the creditors, and also, subject as hereinafter is mentioned, and so far as the creditors of the said company are concerned, to take part in, consent to, or approve of any compromise, composition, or arbitration, or other arrangement which the official manager may propose to make or enter into, either with the debtors or creditors of the said company, or with the contributories or alleged contributories thereof, or any or either of them, as well between themselves as between themselves or either of them and the creditors of the said company, or otherwise, in respect of its estate or affairs, and which compromise, composition, or arbitration the official manager is hereby authorised, subject to such consent and leave as herein and hereinafter mentioned, to make and enter into; and all the creditors of the said company, whether their debts shall have been then proved or not, shall, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, be fully and effectually bound by the acts of such representatives or representative as to all such matters as are authorised by this act.

4. No such compromise, composition, arbitration, or other arrangement as in the last section mentioned shall be valid, as against the creditors of the company, unless the same be made with the consent of such representatives, and with leave of the judge or master; and every such compromise, composition, arbitration, or other arrangement shall be subject to such conditions (if any) as to obtaining the consent of creditors, or any proportion of them, as the said judge or master shall think fit to direct.

5. All orders, directions, reports, and other proceedings of or before the judge or master under this act shall be subject to the appeals given by the two aforesaid Joint-stock Companies Winding-up Acts, 1848 and 1849; and all orders, directions, reports, and other proceedings of or before the Court of Bankruptcy under this act shall be subject to the appeals given by the Bankrupt-law Consolidation Act, 1849.

6. No creditor or claimant shall be prejudiced or affected by any compromise, composition, arbitration, or other arrangement hereinbefore authorised, or by carrying the same into effect, as to his right or remedy against any person other than the company and the members and contributories thereof.

7. When any such company has been or shall be adjudicated bankrupt, then, if or so soon as creditors' assignees shall have been appointed, or, when any such company shall not have been or be adjudicated bankrupt, then after the judge or master shall by advertisement have called on the creditors to appoint a representative or representatives as hereinbefore mentioned, no such action as is mentioned in the 73rd section of the said Joint-stock Companies Winding-up Act, 1848, shall be commenced or proceeded with, otherwise than for the purpose of making the company bankrupt, nor shall any execution or scire facias be issued or proceeded with against the person, property, or effects of any member or members for the time being of such company, or any former member or members thereof, except by leave of the Court of Bankruptcy where such company has been made bankrupt before an order shall have been made for winding up the company, or of the said judge or master where such company has not been made bankrupt before such order shall have been made; and no time which shall elapse after the appointment of creditors' assignees as aforesaid, or after the said creditors shall be so called on, shall be reckoned as part of the time which by virtue of any statute of limitations or otherwise is or shall be limited for commencing or prosecuting any action, suit, step, or proceeding against the company, or the persons being members or contributories thereof, with reference to or in respect of any debt or demand which might be discharged or affected by any such compromise, composition, arbitration, or other arrangement as is hereinbefore mentioned.

8. On the hearing of the application of any creditor of any such company for leave to commence or proceed with any such action, (otherwise than as aforesaid), or to issue or proceed with a writ of scire facias or execution as aforesaid, it shall be a sufficient ground for refusing such leave if the person against whom or against whose property or effects such action, scire facias, or execution shall be sought to be commenced, issued, or proceeded with, shall give or shall have given to the official assignee, in case such company shall have been declared bankrupt before an order shall have been made for winding up the company, or to the official manager in case such company shall not have been declared bankrupt before such order shall have been made, security to the satisfaction of the Court of Bankruptcy, or of the master or judge, as the case may be, for payment of such sum or sums of money, and upon such terms, and to be applied in such manner, as the said court or the said master or judge shall require, having regard to the debts and liabilities of such company and to the circumstances of the case, and upon payment of such costs as the said Court of Bankruptcy or the said master or judge may think fit: provided always, that such security to the official manager shall be subject to the consent of the representative (if any) for the time being of the creditors of such company, or if there shall be no such representative at the time of giving such security, then the same shall be subject to the consent of the representative of such creditors when appointed.

9. The provisions contained in the 38th, 40th, and 48th sections of the Joint-stock Companies Winding-up Act, 1848, shall extend to and comprise creditors or persons who have claimed to be creditors of the said company, as well as contributories and alleged contributories; and after the judge or master shall have called on the creditors to appoint a representative or representatives, as hereinbefore mentioned, such creditors and persons who have claimed to be creditors shall be entitled to attend the proceedings, and to submit such proposals and to inspect such books as in the said sections of the said act are mentioned.

10. Every order for payment of money made or to be made by the judge or master under and by virtue of the said Joint-stock Companies Winding-up Acts of 1848 and 1849, or either of them, or of this act, shall be deemed and taken to be an order of a court of equity within the meaning of the 6th section of the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 29, intituled "An Act to amend the Laws concerning Judgments in Ireland," and such order shall be capable of being registered under the provisions of the said section, upon an affidavit containing the several particulars required by the said 6th section of the said last-mentioned act; and the official manager shall be deemed, under any such order, to be the creditor of any contributory against whom such order has been or shall be made; and the registration of any such affidavit shall operate and to the like manner and effect as is enacted and provided in the 7th section of the last-mentioned act respecting affidavits made and registered under the 6th and 7th sections of such last-mentioned act.

11. It shall be lawful for the judge or master of the High Court of Chancery in England, acting in the winding up of any company, to appoint any person in Ireland, and it shall be lawful for the Master of the High Court of Chancery in Ireland, acting as aforesaid, to appoint any person in England, other than or in addition to the commissioners, judges, and other persons named in the 20th section of the Joint-stock Companies Winding-up Act, 1849, to be commissioners for the purposes and with the same powers and authorities as in the said 20th section of the last-mentioned Winding-up Act are named or referred to in that behalf.

12. This act shall be taken and construed as a part of the said Joint-stock Companies Winding-up Acts, 1848 and 1849.

13. The words "shareholder" and "member" shall be severally taken to include all contributories or alleged contributories within the meaning of the said Joint-stock Companies Winding-up Acts, 1848 and 1849, and also all persons who may apprehend or desire to be discharged from responsibility in respect of the debts, liabilities, or obligations of the company.

14. In citing this act in other acts of Parliament, and in legal instruments and in legal proceedings, it shall be sufficient to use the expression "The Joint-stock Companies Winding-up Amendment Act, 1857."

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Trinity Term.—20 Victoria.—June 4, 1857.

This Court will, on Saturday, the 13th, Monday, the 15th, Tuesday, the 16th, Wednesday, the 17th, Tuesday, the 23rd, Wednesday, the 24th, Thursday, the 25th, and Friday, the 26th days of June instant, hold sittings, and will at such sittings commence with the country new trials then pending in the New Trial Paper, after which the Court will proceed with the Special Paper, and if there be any time remaining, the Crown Paper will then be taken.

The Court will also hold a sitting on Saturday, the 4th day of July next, for the purpose of giving judgments only.

Witnesses before the House of Lords.—A report has been published by the select committee appointed to consider and report on the expediency of altering the present mode of administering oaths to witnesses to be examined by committees of the House. The committee have unanimously agreed to the following resolutions:—"That it is expedient to discontinue the practice of examining witnesses on oath before committees in all cases in which the administration of an oath does not appear to the House necessary for the purpose of the inquiry. The committees ought therefore in future to examine the witnesses without their having been previously sworn, except in cases in which it may be otherwise ordered by the House. That as the inquiries before committees on private bills involve questions of fact, in which private interests are concerned, it is expedient that such committees should be directed by a standing order to examine witnesses on oath, except in cases in which it may be otherwise ordered by the House."

Member returned to serve in Parliament.—George Skirrow Beecroft, Esq., for the borough of Leeds, in the room of Robert Hall, Esq., deceased.

Commissioners to administer Oaths in Chancery.—The Lord Chancellor has appointed the following gentlemen to be Commissioners to administer oaths in the High Court of Chancery:—Ezekiel Evans Fear, of Sherborne, Dorsetshire; and Edward Wates, of Gravesend, Kent.

The Right Hon. Sir Alexander Edmund Cockburn, Knt., Lord Chief Justice of her Majesty's Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, has appointed the following gentlemen to be Perpetual Commissioners for taking the acknowledgments of deeds to be executed by married women:—William Brittan, of Bristol, in and for the city of Bristol and county of the same city, also in and for the county of Somerset; Robert Cook, of Bath, in and for the city of Bath, also in and for the county of Somerset; William Cockerell, of Cambridge, in and for the county of Cambridge; Edward Evans, of Chester, in and for the city of Chester, also in and for the county of Chester; Charles Ehret Grover, of Hemel Hempstead, Hertfordshire, in and for the county of Herts; Ephraim Wayman, of Cambridge, in and for the county of Cambridge; Edwin Augustus Smith, of Blandford Forum, Dorsetshire, in and for the county of Dorset; John Henry Square, of Kingsbridge, Devonshire, in and for the county of Devon; John Taylor, of Bakewell, Derbyshire, in and for the county of Derby; William Hope Mitchell, of Tarporley, Cheshire, in and for the county of Chester; Richard Greenway, of Pontypool, Monmouthshire, in and for the county of Monmouth; Frederic Broadbent, of Bolton-le-Moors, Lancashire, in and for the county of Lancaster; and Walter James Scott, of North Walsham, Norfolk, in and for the county of Norfolk.

THE STANDARD.—On and from MONDAY, June 29, THE STANDARD will become a first-class Morning Newspaper, consisting of Eight Pages, (size of the "Times"), and containing all the News of the Day, price 2*d*. THE STANDARD will enter upon a new career, and will supply the want of the age—a really cheap Newspaper, large enough to report all passing events with ample fulness, and sufficiently independent and fearless to expose wrongdoing. It will not court any party, nor advocate any exclusive interest.

THE STANDARD will be published daily, at the same hour as all other Morning Newspapers. Advertisements inserted at 6*d*. per line.

Office—129, Fleet-street, London.

NEW EVENING PAPER.—PRICE 2*d*.

THE EVENING HERALD.—On and from the 29th June will be published the EVENING HERALD, Four full-sized Pages, price 2*d*.—Evening Papers hitherto have been content with very little more than a mere repetition of the morning's news. The EVENING HERALD, however, will devote its chief space to the full report of those newer matters of interest that arise during the day. Its intelligence will comprise all the Political, Commercial, Foreign, and Domestic Occurrences to the hour of going to press.

The EVENING HERALD and its contemporary, the "Morning Herald," will be the representative organs of Conservatism, both Papers being the avowed and only acknowledged journals of the Conservative Party. Advertisements appearing in the "Morning Herald" inserted at half price in the EVENING HERALD.

WHEREAS it has lately come to my knowledge that some unprincipled person or persons have for some time past been imposing upon the public, by selling to the Trade and others a spurious article under the name of BOND'S PERMANENT MARKING INK; this is to give Notice, that I am the original and sole Proprietor and Manufacturer of the said Article, and do not employ any traveller, or authorise any persons to represent themselves as coming from my establishment, for the purpose of selling the said Ink. This Caution is published by me to prevent further imposition upon the public, and serious injury to myself.

E. R. BOND, Sole Executrix and Widow of the late John Bond, 28, Long-lane, West Smithfield, London.

 To avoid disappointment from the substitution of counterfeits, be careful to ask for the genuine Bond's Permanent Marking Ink; and further to distinguish it, observe that NO SIXPENNY SIZE is or has at any time been prepared by him, the Inventor and Proprietor.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, JUNE 20, 1857.

WHOEVER takes the trouble to wade through the cases which have been decided by the Court of Appeal in Bankruptcy, with reference to bankrupts' certificates of conformity, cannot fail to be struck with the numerous discrepancies and contradictions apparent in the judgments. These cases afford an unwelcome instance of the perplexity and confusion which will inevitably arise where the Legislature has reposed a discretionary authority in the Court, but the Court has neglected to lay down at the very first opportunity some fixed principles by which the exercise of that discretion must be regulated. The Court of Bankruptcy, indeed, and that part of the public principally interested in the due administration of the bankrupt law, labour under this misfortune—the decisions of the commissioners, careful, learned, and elaborate as many of them are, have, nevertheless, very rarely been reported; and those that have been reported are seldom, if ever, quoted or commented upon in the Court of Appeal. The judges of appeal themselves, who have jurisdiction to pronounce upon a discretionary as well as any other sentence of the Court below, are thus ignorant of the opinions entertained by that Court upon any particular point, and may upset at one blow a rule which has been uniformly acted upon for years, and is supposed to have become law. Uncertainty, at all times a serious evil, is here so much the more to be deplored, because it emanates from the superior jurisdiction, and because it might, at an earlier period, have been so easily anticipated by a few concise and intelligible expositions of the judicial mind. In a matter of so much importance to the welfare of the commercial world, especially since the recent lamentable disclosures of fraud and improvidence among traders, we may, perhaps, do good service by attempting to derive order out of chaos, and by putting together a few propositions, which either the policy of the bankrupt law or the dicta of the most eminent authorities have convinced us must ultimately be adopted.

There are four sections of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, which define the boundaries of the discretion vested in the Court of Bankruptcy by that statute with respect to the allowance, suspension, or refusal of the certificate, when it arises, and how it is to be controlled. These sections are the 198th, 199th, 201st, and 256th. The 198th section directs the appointment of a public sitting, at which the Court, having regard to the conformity of the bankrupt to the law of bankruptcy, and to his conduct as a trader before as well as after his bankruptcy, is either to find him entitled to his certificate, and allow the same, or to refuse or suspend the allowance thereof, or annex such conditions thereto as the justice of the case may require. The 199th section specifies what the commissioner has to certify, and refers to Schedule (Z.), which shews how the class of certificate to be awarded must be determined. The 201st section says that no bankrupt shall be entitled to a certificate of conformity, and that any such certificate, if allowed, shall be void, if the bankrupt shall have done any of the acts therein mentioned; and the 256th enacts, that if at any sitting or adjourned sitting for the allowance of the certificate of any bankrupt it shall appear that he has committed any of the offences therein enumerated, the Court shall refuse to grant the certificate, or shall suspend the same for such time as it shall think fit, and shall in like manner refuse to grant the bankrupt any further protection. The 199th and 201st sections are restrictive; they disentitle a bankrupt to a certificate, and invalidate the same if granted—the one, in express terms, whenever a bankrupt has infringed its provisions; the other, by necessary implication, whenever the Court cannot conscientiously certify all the facts thereby required. (Wagner v. Imbrie, 6 Exch. 882; 15 Jur., part 1, p. 803; Ex parte Staner, 2 De G., Mac., & G. 263; 16 Jur., part 1, p. 1124). The 198th and 256th sections, on the other hand, are permissive, and intrust the Court, the former with a general, the latter with a limited, discretion in certain particular instances. For our present purpose, however, which is to ascertain upon what system the Court ought to exercise these powers, and not to interpret disputed phrases in the act, we need not dwell upon these clauses, but may pass at once to the first essential topic to be considered—the policy of the bankrupt law.

The policy of the bankrupt law has, we think, been much misunderstood, and the means for attaining the end have frequently been confounded with the end itself. The true design of that law we believe to be the preservation and encouragement of commerce. No more effectual means of accomplishing such an object could be found than those by which a high standard of commercial morality should be maintained; and it is with this view that the enactments relating to the certificate of conformity were conceived. The discretion to allow, refuse, suspend, or annex conditions to a certificate, according to the behaviour of the bankrupt, is a power which, if wisely and consistently employed, holds out the strongest inducement to integrity and prudence in trade, and puts a strict curb on recklessness, rapacity, and dishonest dealings. If our definition of the policy of the bankrupt law be correct, it follows, as a necessary corollary, that the touchstone of the discretion confided to the Court with respect to the certificate is the benefit, not of individuals, but of the public. The discretion must be exercised on judicial principles; but in the case of a certificate, "those judicial principles involve the duty of attending to the public interest and the claims of society at least as much as in any other class of cases coming under the consideration of the Court." (Per Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, L. J., in Ex parte Selby, 2 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 29). In that balance, then, every certificate must be weighed. In the one scale must be placed the danger to the public of allowing a rash or dishonest debtor to re-enter into business without having paid his previous debts in full; in the other, the mischief of never opening an escape from pecuniary embarrassments to a trader simply unfortunate, or whose conduct has not been unpardonably blameable. (See per Lord Cranworth in Ex parte Curtis, 2 De G., Mac., & G. 262). It is to this latter mischief, we presume, that Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, V. C., alluded, when, in Ex parte Hollingworth, (4 De G. & S. 44; 15 Jur., part 1, p. 914), he observed, that "in judging of the conduct of a bankrupt with reference to his certificate, it may not be necessary to apply to him the rigid rules properly applicable to men at their ease and well to pass in the world," but that "a certain degree of indulgence may be fit to be allowed to a man in failing circumstances and in difficulties." We should be careful how we admit this doctrine. If it means anything more than that the certificate of a culpable bankrupt must be dealt with according to the degree of censure to which he is justly amenable, then it becomes dangerous. No man should be led to think, that when he gets into trouble he may with impunity relax that rule of honesty which in prosperity he is bound to obey. The law is equal to all, and honesty is no chamelion, to change according to the different lights in which it is regarded. In Ex parte Dobson, (2 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 56), however, the same learned judge stated that he did not recollect any case in which, after wilful falsehood or sheer dishonesty had been proved against a bankrupt, the Lords Justices had consented to grant a certificate. The justice of the rule his Lordship supported upon this ground, because "in certificate cases the interests of society as well as of the parties concerned are to be regarded." Even this position might accurately have been extended by adding, that the interests of society are then paramount to those of the parties, and that the latter are only to be regarded so far as they bear upon the former. In the case of Ex parte Selby their Lordships acted upon the principle thus enunciated. There, a solicitor having been guilty of a gross breach of duty towards a client, by retaining uninvested for more than twenty years, and that without the knowledge of the client, a sum of money which the client had transmitted to him for the purpose of being invested on good mortgage security, it was urged at the bar, that the client, when he discovered that there was no security, had remained on friendly terms with his solicitor, and had treated the matter as a mere question of debt, taking no active steps to enforce payment, but continuing to receive interest, and therefore that there had been a condonation on his part. The solicitor's client alone opposed his certificate, and not the assignees; but Sir G. J. Turner, L. J., said, that "it was new to hear it argued, that when public interest was concerned any private dealing could amount to a condonation." Thus, then, fraud is at all times an insuperable obstacle to the allowance of a certificate; and few, perhaps, will doubt that the public interest imperatively demands at least so much protection. On the other hand, negligence, rashness, and extravagant expenditure are faults which will justify either a refusal or suspension of the certificate, according to the number and character of the particular instances. (See per Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, L. J., in Ex parte Dobson). But the line which separates them from actual dishonesty is often very slender, and in such cases the task of discrimination becomes proportionately difficult, although sometimes absolutely necessary. We will give some examples of the cases which most commonly occur, premising that in the absence of authority we should have been inclined to place several of the cases in which the certificate has been simply suspended in the same category with those in which it has been absolutely refused. In the following instances the certificate was refused:—Where the bankrupt had systematically bought goods on credit for the purpose of selling them under cost price. (Ex parte Holthouse, 1 De G., Mac., & G. 237). Where the bankrupt, a banker, had gone on trading and receiving deposits long after the time when he must have known that he was hopelessly insolvent. (Ex parte Rufford, 2 De G., Mac., & G. 234). Where the bankrupt obtained a loan by falsely representing himself as a trader. (Ex parte Leslie, 2 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 82). Where the bankrupt had sold goods shortly before the bankruptcy, and was unable to give any satisfactory account of the proceeds; which was held to be a fraudulent removal of goods in order to abstract them from creditors. (Ex parte Dobson; and see also Ex parte Stuart, 4 De G. & S. 49, and Ex parte Simond, 3 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 424). Where the bankrupt purchased goods on credit one day and stopped payment on the next, and could not give a credible and satisfactory explanation of the transaction. (Ex parte Curties). In the following cases the certificate was merely suspended:—Where the bankrupt had commenced without any capital a business to which he had not been brought up, and had been in the habit of buying goods on credit, and pledging them immediately afterwards to raise money to carry on business, but in accordance with the custom of his trade, and with an intention and reasonable expectation of afterwards redeeming the goods. (Ex parte Manico, 3 De G., Mac., & G. 502; 17 Jur., part 1, p. 359). Where a man for two or three years before his bankruptcy had been continually in such a condition that all his assets, if realised, would have amounted to less than his debts, and had nevertheless continued to trade all that time without having a reasonable expectation that he should thereby be able to surmount his difficulties or to benefit his creditors. (Ex parte Dornford, 4 De G. & S. 29; 15 Jur., part 1, p. 278; Ex parte Johnson, 4 De G. & S. 25). Where a trader had carried on business in one town, and there incurred debts to the amount of 6000*l.* over and above all his assets, and had then commenced business in another town and incurred new debts, without informing his new creditors of the state of his pecuniary circumstances. (Ex parte Wooldridge, 24 L. J., Bank., 17). Where a bankrupt in the course of a two years' trading had become liable upon accommodation bills to the sum of 59,000*l.* (Ex parte Hammond, 24 L. J., Bank., 2; see also Ex parte Culhane, 2 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 863). It has also been laid down that where a bankrupt has engaged in reckless trading and speculations of a desperate character, the certificate ought to be refused; but that a man who, when solvent, has engaged in a great number of different undertakings, which he had reason to believe would be successful, is not a reckless trader. (Ex parte Wakefield, 4 De G. & S. 18; 15 Jur., part 1, p. 961). That purchasing goods on credit for the purpose of pledging them is fraudulent; but that where goods are purchased, not for the purpose of being pledged, but in the ordinary course of trade, though pledged immediately afterwards, this is not fraud. (Ex parte Martyn, 2 De G., Mac., & G. 227, 228). That if a bankrupt has dealt in accommodation bills, that is a circumstance requiring a full and satisfactory explanation, but is not necessarily one affecting his title to a certificate; the main point for consideration is, how far the bankrupt had reason to believe that he could discharge his liability on such bills on their becoming due. (Ex parte Hammond). That the mere act of passing or depositing an accommodation bill with a banker, without any statement that it is an accommodation bill, does not amount to a representation that it is not one. (Ib.) Finally, we may observe, that in judging of the conduct of a bankrupt in any particular transaction, all the attendant circumstances must be taken into consideration. Thus, the indiscretions of youth will not be so severely dealt with as those of maturer years; (Ex parte Martyn; Ex parte Manico); and, on the other side, bankers and other such like persons, in whom more than ordinary confidence is necessarily reposed, will be more stringently dealt with, because they have greater opportunities than other traders of defrauding their customers, and because their business, if properly conducted, is safer to themselves—their failure more mischievous to the public. (Ex parte Rufford; In re St. Albans Bank, 1 Fonb. N. R. 84). There are two further questions of general principle in relation to this subject upon which it may be useful to say a few words. The first of these questions is, whether the bankrupt law is to be interpreted beneficially for creditors. In Ex parte Matheson, (1 De G., Mac., & G. 448; 16 Jur., part 1, p. 769), Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, L. J., commenting upon the absence of any express enactment to that effect in the Bankrupt-law Consolidation Act, 1849, hinted that that statute was not to be so construed. The opposite opinion, however, has usually prevailed in the Court of Bankruptcy, and is, we venture to think, that most consonant with sound policy, as well as with the spirit of the act itself. In Ex parte Jardine, (1 Fonb. N. R. 184), Mr. Commissioner Holroyd said—"The object of the act is to support commercial credit, and herein to benefit creditors, to prevent fraud, and to relieve the unfortunate trader who has followed the known rules of honesty and integrity." This statement very closely accords with our own original definition. Benefit to creditors is the necessary consequence of a design for the better maintenance of commerce. Commerce cannot live without credit, and enactments which are to be expounded with a view of encouraging good faith and credit generally among traders must needs be expounded beneficially for the bankrupt's creditors in each individual case. (See In re St. Albans Bank, 1 Fonb. N. R. 85). The second question is, whether the Court administers punishment under the bankrupt laws. In Ex parte Hunt, (21 L. J., Bank., 30), Lord Cranworth remarked, that so to consider the act would be a misconstruction. But his Lordship added, "If the granting of the certificate is delayed until a future day, its delay is tantamount to a punishment, because the bankrupt in the meantime is open to arrest by the creditor." Now, it is no doubt obvious enough that something more than the mere reward of innocence or punishment of guilt was contemplated by the enactments under discussion. The certificate is a badge of reputation, greater or less, according to the time and terms of the grant. For the protection of the community a token is thereby set upon the bankrupt trader, by which all people may know what manner of man he is, whom, after a failure to meet his engagements, they are again called upon to trust. But at the same time the bankrupt who has been once branded with the fatal emblem —refusal or suspension of his certificate—is not likely again to procure for himself that confidence or respect which he might have obtained before, and must necessarily find his efforts to rise in the world beset with far greater difficulties than when he first started. He bears upon him an indelible mark of ignominy, and is in fact subjected to a penalty, the weight of which he will probably feel for the remainder of his life. In cases which fall within the 256th section of the Bankrupt-law Consolidation Act, the frame of the act seems to shew that a punishment was intended. While the 198th section comes under the head of provisions with respect to the certificate of conformity, the 256th section is placed under that of offences against the law relating to bankruptcy, and is classed with a number of the most stringent penal enactments. In Ex parte Manico Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, L. J., laid it down that the 256th section must receive rather a strict than a large construction; and Sir G. J. Turner, L. J., spoke of inflicting a penalty under that section, and of the punishment which the statute had awarded. Lord Cranworth, however, in his observations above quoted, appears to have had in view the fact, that when the Court considers a bankrupt to deserve imprisonment, and accordingly refuses to protect him from arrest, that part of his punishment does not proceed directly from the Court, but is left to be inflicted according to the passions, caprices, or indulgence of the several creditors. This is a circumstance much to be regretted, inasmuch as it opens a door to all sorts of underhand trickery and collusion. The bankrupt is tempted to give a fraudulent preference to a hostile creditor; a creditor to conceal the delinquencies of the friendly bankrupt. The one neglects the public welfare to secure his own advantage; the other, to escape the consequences of his previous misconduct, is guilty of misconduct still more mischievous. That the sentence of a Court of justice may have its proper effect as an example, the power of enforcing that sentence should be vested in the Court, and in the Court alone.

GRAND JURIES.

Sir Frederick Thesiger has brought in a bill to dispense with the attendance of grand juries within the Metropolitan Police District, and as the Government approve of the measure, it will probably become law during the present session. The honourable and learned member limits his bill to the Metropolitan Police District (including, therefore, the Central Criminal Court) because it is supplied with stipendiary magistrates of learning and ability, before whom he proposes that an investigation should always take place previous to a trial within the above-mentioned district. We cannot explain the character of the bill, or the causes which have led to its introduction, better or more concisely than in the language of Sir Frederick Thesiger himself when moving for leave to introduce it. In the course of his speech on that occasion he said, that in 1849 the late Sir J. Jervis brought in a bill to facilitate the administration of justice in the metropolitan district, which contained provisions rendering unnecessary the summoning of grand juries. That bill was referred to a select committee, who examined, among others, the clerk of the Central Criminal Court, the Common Serjeant of that day, Mr. Humphreys, a solicitor practising in the Central Criminal Court, who had written an excellent pamphlet on Grand Juries, an alderman of the city of London, the chairman of the Newington Sessions, and a merchant of the city of London who had been foreman of grand juries for a great number of years. These witnesses expressed an unanimous opinion that it was desirable grand juries should not be assembled within the metropolitan district, and this opinion was supported by reasons which seemed to him to be unanswerable. Nothing, however, was done on this subject. But in the year 1852 the then Recorder of London, whose unfortunate illness was deeply to be deplored, and whose high character and sound judgment it was to be hoped would yet be useful to his country, addressed the grand jury, after considerable experience of the working of this system, in the following terms:—

"The great mass of the cases were, as usual, of the ordinary description, and many of their predecessors in that box had expressed an opinion that it was unnecessary that they should be called together for the purpose of considering such cases. With regard to the great body of them, which had previously undergone full inquiry by magistrates of great experience and legal knowledge, he (the learned Recorder) entirely concurred in the opinion of the grand jury, that their services in this district were perfectly useless. He was afraid that the grand jury not only occasioned a very great loss of time, but that they also were the means of increasing very considerably the expenses of criminal prosecutions, and that in some instances the grand jury also afforded an opportunity for parties to defeat the purposes of justice by tampering with the witnesses, and that in others they were made the medium of occasioning great injustice, by affording vindictive persons an opportunity of preferring unfounded charges behind the backs of those they accused."

"The grand jury of the fifth session of the Central Criminal Court of the year 1852 beg leave to express their unanimous opinion that a grand jury within the limits of the jurisdiction of the stipendiary magistrates is wholly unnecessary. It increases the expense and adds to the delay of criminal prosecutions. It affords an opportunity for corruption, and for tampering with prosecutors and witnesses. It enables an evil-disposed person to throw his victim into prison by a false ex parte statement made behind his back, and without any previous notice. It is, in fact, an instrument of extortion and of oppression, and as it frustrates the ends of justice, it is worse than useless, and ought to be immediately abolished. The grand jury having been informed that presentments to the same effect have been made by other grand juries; that copies of several of these presentments have been laid before the House of Commons on the motion of Mr. Matthew Foster, the member for Berwick; that a committee of the House of Commons appointed to investigate the subject reported that such a tribunal had become unnecessary; that a bill was introduced into Parliament by the present Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, the Right Hon. Sir John Jervis, to abolish it, but which bill was allowed to be dropped by the late Ministry; they consider that to suffer its continuance, in opposition to the often-recorded opinions of those best qualified to judge of its utility, has a tendency to bring into contempt, not only the administration of justice, but the laws of the country. The grand jury, therefore, request that a copy of this presentment may be forwarded to the Prime Minister and to the Secretary of State for the Home Department of her Majesty's new Ministry, and they hope that a bill to abolish the grand jury of the Central Criminal Court and of the Middlesex Sessions will form a part of their earliest measures of law reform."

In that year (1852) he, (Sir F. Thesiger), as Attorney-General in Lord Derby's Government, introduced a bill to dispense with grand juries within the metropolitan district, but he was compelled to withdraw it in consequence of the dissolution which shortly afterwards took place. . . . . His observations might be supposed to apply to grand juries in general; but he wished it to be understood that he was not prepared to prevent the assembling of grand juries in the provinces. He deemed it advantageous to the public that magistrates and gentlemen of the counties should be associated with the judges in their periodical administration of criminal justice throughout the country. The appointment of a public prosecutor, or the adoption of some improved system of preliminary investigation into offences, might hereafter render it necessary to consider the whole subject of grand juries; but he strictly confined himself at present to the case of the metropolitan district, to which any sound arguments against grand juries in general would apply with peculiar force. It was superfluous to employ any antiquarian research in now discussing this question; suffice it to say that grand juries were originally viewed in the light of public accusers; but in the reign of Edward III, when justices of the peace were introduced, their functions underwent a change. Ultimately, instead of possessing any original jurisdiction, a grand jury became merely a tribunal to receive evidence, and decide whether there was a primâ facie case for sending accused persons to take their trial. This was a most important duty, which could be safely and conveniently superseded only where a better system had been provided. This was precisely the case of the Metropolitan Police District, where magistrates of experience and legal talent acted continually in the face of the public. Their principal functions consisted of receiving charges against alleged offenders, and of examining witnesses in the presence of the accused, who was confronted with his accusers, and had an opportunity of cross-examining them and the rest of the witnesses. After a careful investigation, conducted under the most favourable circumstances for arriving at a correct decision, the magistrate determined whether there were sufficient grounds for sending the prisoner to trial. The depositions originally taken were transmitted to the court to which the offender was committed, and every formality essential to the protection of the public and to the prevention of unfounded charges was completed. But another preliminary ceremony had to be gone through before the trial. Twenty-three gentlemen, generally unaccustomed to legal inquiries, were collected together in a private room, where, with closed doors, under an oath of secresy, and in the absence of the accused, they proceeded to re-investigate the very point already determined by the committing magistrate —viz. whether there was a primâ facie case for putting the person charged upon his trial. With nothing to guide them but the indictment containing the accusation and the names of the witnesses, they had to grope their way in the dark, frequently through a labyrinth of complicated facts. If the grand jury, under these unfavourable circumstances, found a true bill, their labours were perfectly supererogatory. If, on the other hand, they threw out the bill, their interference was often purely mischievous. Justice in their hands was liable to miscarry, either from a misconception as to their own functions, some jurymen imagining that they had to decide on the guilt or innocence of the accused; or from the witnesses being tampered with, and induced to suppress the evidence they had previously given when before the magistrates. This the witnesses could do in perfect security, because their examination before the grand jury was conducted in secresy. In fact, the grand jury system multiplied the chances of escape for the guilty to such an extent that it was called "the hope of the London thieves." The innocent would be benefited by the change he proposed, because, after such a person had been once committed by a magistrate, his innocence would be established in the face of the country if he took his trial; whereas a suspicion would probably attach to him, even though the grand jury threw out the bill against him, owing to the reasons for their decision being unknown to the public. As an illustration of the present system, he thought he could not mention anything more forcible than a case which occurred last year in his own experience. The medical attendant of a county lunatic asylum, after having been assaulted by a patient, directed him to be taken to a shower-bath, to be kept there for half-an-hour, and afterwards to have a dose of tartar emetic. The unfortunate man was placed in the shower-bath, and after having been kept there for twenty-eight minutes he was removed, the medicine which had been prescribed was given to him, and in half-an-hour afterwards he died. He (Sir F. Thesiger) did not venture to express any opinion with regard to the conduct of the medical man. The treatment which he ordered might have been necessary to his patient; but nobody could doubt that that was a subject which ought to have undergone a most searching public investigation; and so thought one of the most able, intelligent, and experienced of the police magistrates before whom the charge was made against the medical man; for, after having carefully examined the whole of the case, he thought it was his duty to send the party for trial. The grand jury, however, for reasons which were unknown, chose to think that it was not a case for inquiry, and they threw out the bill. He could multiply these instances if necessary, but he thought that the illustration which he had given was sufficient to shew the mischief which might arise from allowing a grand jury to interfere after there had been a public investigation before a magistrate, which was not only a protection to the party accused, but also to the public against the possibility of the accused party escaping from justice. But the mere throwing out of bills by grand juries in such cases was not one-half of the evil consequent upon this system within the metropolitan district. He believed that there was hardly a session of the Central Criminal Court or a Middlesex Session held without persons preferring indictments for different classes of misdemeanour, for the purpose of revenge or extortion. It was not at all necessary that the parties should go before a magistrate to prefer accusations of that description. If a person was desirous of gratifying his malice or extorting money he might wait for the assembling of the grand jury, and then, without the slightest notice to the party, he might prefer his indictment. The proceeding was altogether secret. If the party got his bill, application might be made at once for a bench warrant; and Saturday was the day generally selected for that purpose, because then the party must remain in custody for nearly two days before bail could be given. Having secured that engine of extortion, the accusing party had good grounds for hoping that the accused would compromise the matter with him, rather than submit to the exposure of a public trial. Provision was intended to be made against such cases by the Central Criminal Court Act, and the manner in which that provision was defeated was a curious instance of the subtlety and evasiveness of fraud. That act provided that no indictment for misdemeanour, except for perjury, should be presented at the Central Criminal Court unless the party was in custody, or unless the prosecutor was bound in recognisances. That of course was to necessitate the intervention of a magistrate; but inasmuch as the Central Criminal Court was the only court mentioned, parties had been in the habit of going to the Middlesex Sessions, and of there procuring the grand jury to find bills of this description. They then removed them to the Central Criminal Court. No recognisances at all were entered into, and so they evaded the provisions of the act of Parliament. Misdemeanours were still presented to the grand jury without any previous investigation before a magistrate. With regard to recognisances, the course which they pursued was this—they went to the magistrate and said, "We want to prosecute A. B. for fraud or conspiracy; bind us over in recognisances;" and without any investigation of the facts, the magistrate bound them over. Now, the consequences of these proceedings were most alarming, and he could not help giving one or two instances which had occurred to his own knowledge. A lady of undoubted respectability was indicted in this secret manner for keeping a brothel by a person who, as was afterwards ascertained, had been under sentence of transportation. She appeared on the day fixed for the trial, but neither the prosecutor nor his witnesses attended. She had the owner of the house in court to shew that the apartments had always been occupied by families of the highest respectability. Of course an acquittal took place immediately, but it was impossible for that lady to avoid the suspicion which was excited in many minds that the prosecutor and his witnesses had been bought off. In another case, a person of great respectability, a banker and solicitor in the county of Surrey, had two indictments preferred against him—one for forgery and one for conspiracy. The party who preferred them had made three similar experiments at the Central Criminal Court and one at the Middlesex Sessions, but without success. But by perseverance he obtained his bills of indictment, and the trial came on before Lord Campbell. The result was an acquittal, accompanied with the applause of the persons in court, Lord Campbell stating to the jury that he had no doubt they would feel that there was not the slightest imputation upon the gentleman's character from the proceedings. But many an innocent party might not have the nerve to stand a public trial. It might be that he was accused of some infamous offence without the slightest foundation. He shrank from the idea of appearing in public, and was therefore willing to pay a very large sum in order to induce the withdrawal of the prosecution. If the party was guilty, there was an additional motive for making a compromise with his prosecutor in that manner, and persons had been found to make a trade of preferring indictments in order to obtain the most infamous extortions. Now, the remedy which he (Sir F. Thesiger) proposed was very simple. He proposed that no charge should be tried in the Central Criminal Court, or in the other courts within the Metropolitan Police District, without a previous investigation before a magistrate. No inquiry before a grand jury would be necessary, and he therefore proposed to dispense with the attendance of a grand jury in such cases. Various subordinate advantages would arise from the measure. In the first place, there would be a very considerable saving of time and expense. Under the present system prosecutors and their witnesses were bound to attend, in the first place, before the clerk of indictments, who prepared their depositions and the indictment. They had then to go before the grand jury; but it frequently happened that they were obliged to remain for two or three days before their case came on; and several hundred persons of different sexes were thus collected together under circumstances which were certainly not advantageous to their morality. The inconvenience, expense, and delay were so great that many persons were deterred from prosecuting. Then, again, the expense was no inconsiderable element for consideration. The witnesses were paid small sums, ranging from 1*s*. 6*d*. to 3*s*. 6*d*. per day, but when this was multiplied by several days, by hundreds of offences, and by twelve sessions a year, it would be found that the aggregate amount was a very considerable one, and a large saving would necessarily take place by the plan he proposed. The clerk of indictments would prepare a list of cases, so that persons would be able to ascertain when their cases were likely to be tried, and would only attend on that day. The business of the session might be thus most conveniently arranged, a great saving of time and money would be effected, and public justice in this district would undoubtedly be greatly facilitated.

BILL IN PROGRESS.

ABSTRACT OF A BILL

To amend the Law relating to the Conveyance of Lands for Charitable Uses.

Preamble.

Sect. 1. No deed or assurance heretofore made, and under which possession is now held for any charitable uses, and no deed or assurance hereafter to be made for any charitable uses whatsoever of any hereditaments of any tenure whatsoever, or of any estate or interest therein, made respectively upon a full and valuable consideration actually paid at or before the making or perfecting such deed or assurance, or reserved by way of rent, rent-charge, or other annual payment, or partly paid at or before the making or perfecting such deed or assurance, and partly reserved as aforesaid, without fraud or collusion, shall be deemed to be null and void within the meaning of the first-recited act if such deed or assurance has been or shall be made to take effect in possession for the charitable use intended immediately from the making thereof, and without any power of revocation, and has been at any time prior to the passing of this act, or shall be within twelve calendar months next after the passing of this act, or within six calendar months next after the making or perfecting such deed or assurance, inrolled in her Majesty's High Court of Chancery.

2. No deed or assurance heretofore made for any charitable uses whatsoever of any hereditaments of any tenure whatsoever, or of any estate or interest therein, not upon such full and valuable consideration as in the first section of this act is mentioned, and under which possession is now held, for any charitable uses, shall be deemed to be null and void, within the meaning of the first-recited act, by reason of such deed or assurance not having been indented, or not purporting to be indented, nor by reason of such deed or assurance not having been sealed and delivered in the presence of two or more credible witnesses, nor by reason of such deed or assurance not having been inrolled in her Majesty's High Court of Chancery within six calendar months next after the execution thereof, nor by reason of such deed or assurance, or any deed forming part of the same transaction, containing any grant or reservation of any peppercorn or other nominal rent, mines, or minerals, or easement, or any covenants or provisions as to the erection, repair, position, or description of buildings, the formation or repair of streets or roads, drainage or nuisances, or any covenants or provisions of the like nature for the use and enjoyment as well of the hereditaments comprised in such deed or assurance as of any other adjacent or neighbouring hereditaments of the donor or grantor, or of any person or persons claiming under him, not comprised in such deed or assurance, or any right of entry on non-payment of any such rent, or breach of any such covenant or provision, or any covenant indemnifying the donor or grantor against any prior incumbrance, or any stipulations of the like nature for the benefit of the donor or grantor, or of any person or persons claiming under him, nor (in the case of any such assurance of hereditaments of copyhold or customary tenure, or of any estate or interest therein) by reason of the same not having been made by deed, if such deed or assurance has been at any time prior to the passing of this act, or shall be within twelve calendar months next after the passing of this act, inrolled in her Majesty's High Court of Chancery.

3. No deed or assurance hereafter to be made for any charitable uses whatsoever of any hereditaments of any tenure whatsoever, or of any estate or interest therein, not upon such full and valuable consideration as in the first section of this act is mentioned, shall be deemed to be null and void, within the meaning of the first-recited act, by reason of such deed or assurance not being indented or not purporting to be indented, nor by reason of such deed or assurance, or any deed forming part of the same transaction, containing any such grant, reservation, covenants, provisions, right of entry, or stipulations for the benefit of the donor or grantor, or of any person or persons claiming under him, as in the second section of this act is mentioned, nor (in the case of any such assurance of hereditaments of copyhold or customary tenure, or of any estate or interest therein) by reason of the same not being made by deed.

4. Where charitable uses of any past deed, &c. not inrolled are declared by any other deed, &c., inrolment of such other deed, &c. sufficient; where neither is inrolled, inrolment of such other deed, &c. requisite.

5. Where charitable uses of any future deed, &c. declared by any other deed, &c., inrolment of such other deed, &c. requisite.

6. Act not to invalidate certain deeds, nor to extend to deeds, &c. already avoided, or to pending suits. When acknowledgment not necessary.

7. Hereditaments conveyed to trustees for charitable uses to vest in successors of original trustees duly appointed.

8. Providing for payments in lieu of fines, &c. as to copyholds.

9. For purposes of enfranchisement, payments to have same force as admittance.

10. The last three preceding sections not to affect property within the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 28.

11. Act not to extend to Scotland or Ireland, nor to prejudice the two universities, or the colleges of Eton, Winchester, or Westminster.

TO the SHAREHOLDERS of the LONDON and PROVINCIAL LAW LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

Although the tightness of the money market has, it would seem, for twelve months at the least, affected temporarily the value of shares in this and similar first-class Companies, still is it not extraordinary, after making due allowance for this circumstance, that in spite of the fact of there being 3*l*. 12*s*. 6*d*. actually accumulated to the credit of each share in this sumptuous Company, the shares for twelve months past should have been negotiated at about 2*l*. 12*s*. 6*d*. only, or at the great discount of 1*l*. per share?

In the year 1856, (after the exertions of ten years), before it had transpired what had been saved and accumulated to the credit of each share, and when the most sanguine probably expected the original paid-up capital of 40,000*l*. (or 2*l*. per share) had not been increased to more than 60,000*l*. in all, (or 3*l*. per share), the shares were at a supposed premium, and repeatedly passed hands at 3*l*. 5*s*. Now, although the accumulation is greater than was expected, and there is the precise sum of 3*l*. 12*s*. 6*d*. actually to the credit of each share in sound and healthy investments undeniably secure, and the dividend until the next division is to be 3*s*. per share, free of property tax, and is payable yearly in July, these shares still remain comparatively neglected. No one acquainted with insurance offices can deny that the business is first class, and sufficiently large to be in every way secure; that it is well and liberally conducted, is supported by the "haut ton" of the Profession in London, and that the position or status of those gentlemen who are on the direction quite precludes the slightest possibility of any but the most accurate and judicious proceedings in the management of the affairs of the Society.

Surely, considering the difficulty in the present age of giving a firm footing rapidly to any new society, it is reasonable to argue that the shares of a Company of such quality should be at some premium. While few persons are, on the one hand, astonished that the original 2*l*. shares in that magnificent Company, "The Legal and General," are selling for 6*l*. 10*s*. per share, which is about par, with accumulations, is it too much to suppose that our shares should cease to be at so absurdly low a price? Considering the present value, one can only fancy that many of the shareholders actually forget the amount paid up and accumulated, lose sight of the certificates mentioning the existence of 3*l*. 12*s*. 6*d*. as regards each share, and that it escapes them there is a silent but certain addition to their capital going on, or that many shares are relinquished by improvident members of the legal profession, either just before or soon after the Long Vacation, to pay for a trip to Baden Baden or some fashionable place of resort.

It does seem extraordinary that while the Profession are investing monies daily in mortgages or other securities, so that their particular attention is directed to the rate of interest for the time being, they should appear entirely to forget that no great time can probably elapse when it will be difficult to employ small sums to pay 4*l*. per cent., where capital is gradually increasing or rolling up like a snow-ball at the same time.

But supposing the matter to be looked at in another shape. The present annual premiums are about 20,000*l*. Is not the business of any good office worth, moderately, at the very least, one year's premium? If so, the shares in this Society should be at 4*l*. 12*s*. 6*d*. each; because, as there are 20,000 shares only, and there is 3*l*. 12*s*. 6*d*. per share now to take care of itself, it requires 20,000*l*. only, or 1*l*. per share, to effect this.

Brother shareholders, be more alive, and, whether you have an interest as executors or otherwise, consider, before for the future you give away under par, at any rate, such safe and good property.

Yours,
A WELL-WISHER TO THE SOCIETY, AND A SHAREHOLDER.

A PRACTICAL TREATISE on the LAWS relating to the CHURCH and the CLERGY. By H. W. CRIPPS, M.A., of the Middle Temple, Barrister at Law, Recorder of Lichfield. The Third Edition, revised and enlarged, containing the Statutes and Cases to the present time.

 Since the publication of the first edition, the progress of legislation on the subjects treated of has rendered necessary considerable alterations and additions in this and in the preceding edition, and while much new matter has been introduced, all that has become obsolete has been omitted. In many other matters the law has been materially altered, and doubtful points have been settled by recently-decided cases, all which are now to be found in the present edition.

LONDON, JUNE 27, 1857.

In our last number we considered the principles upon which the Court of Bankruptcy ought to act when exercising the discretion committed to it by the stat. 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, with respect to a bankrupt's certificate of conformity. There is, however, one very important principle, to which want of space compelled us to forbear allusion. By the 198th section the Court is allowed to annex such conditions to the certificate as the justice of the case may require. Now, with respect to this clause, it has been decided that it must be read as if the words were "conditions within the jurisdiction and power of the Court;" (per Alderson, B., in Grace v. Bishop, 11 Exch. 424); and also that no condition can be annexed to the certificate which contravenes the policy or purposes of the bankrupt law. Thus in Ex parte Hammond (24 L. J., Bank., 2) it was thought unwise and impolitic to impose a condition that the certificate, either wholly or partially, should not have the effect of protecting after-acquired property. "If," it was said, "the bankrupt began to trade again, he laboured under a debt undischarged, and his undischarged creditors had power to enforce process against him, to the prejudice of subsequent creditors." (Per Sir G. J. Turner, L. J.) Instead of annexing such a condition, "the better course is to suspend the certificate, with liberty to apply." (Per Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, L. J., in Ex parte Culhane, 2 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 863). Nevertheless, extreme cases may occur in which justice may require such a course to be taken. (Per Sir G. J. Turner, L. J., in Ex parte Hodgson, 3 De G., Mac., & G. 555). Thus, in Ex parte Burghes, (1 Fonb. N. R. 116), Mr. Commissioner Fonblanque held, that where a bankrupt has committed breaches of trust, the Court, in allowing the certificate, will annex a condition, that it shall not be available against the cestuis que trust; and in Ex parte Wakefield, (4 De G. & S. 18; 15 Jur., part 1, p. 961), where a bankrupt was alleged to have committed breaches of trust, it was ordered that the certificate should be so worded as not to protect him from any demands against him as trustee. In Ex parte Hollingworth also (4 De G. & S. 44; 15 Jur., part 1, p. 914) a certificate was granted, with a condition that it should do no more than protect the bankrupt's person from arrest. The bankrupt was a shipowner and insurance broker, and in 1833 had been made bankrupt, and paid 3*s.* 6*d.* in the pound. In 1835 he had made one composition with his creditors, and in 1846 he had made another, under which they received 5*s.* in the pound. In 1849 he signed a declaration of insolvency, and placed it in the hands of his solicitor. Afterwards he contracted new debts, without disclosing this circumstance, although without any false statement or misrepresentation. Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, V. C., alluding to the stat. 6 Geo. 4, c. 16, s. 127, appears to have said, although there is a slight variance between the reports, that the circumstances of the former bankruptcy and compositions imposed on the bankrupt the burthen of shewing, that, if he was entitled to any certificate, he was entitled to something more than a protection for his person, and that otherwise he ought not to be put in a more favourable situation than he would have been in under the former statute. However, in Ex parte Hodgson, where a similar condition had been annexed by a commissioner to the certificate of a bankrupt, who on a former occasion had compounded with his creditors, paying them only 5*s.* in the pound, it was remarked by the Court above, that the omission in the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, of a similar clause to that in the act of Geo. 4, that future assets were not to be discharged where, previously to the bankruptcy, there had been a composition, under which the trader had paid less than 15*s.* in the pound to his former creditors, was in the bankrupt's favour; and the condition was rescinded.

There are also two questions upon the construction of the 198th and 256th sections of the Bankrupt-law Consolidation Act, 1849, which have occasioned some controversy, and are, perhaps, not very easy to decide. The 198th section directs the Court to have regard to the conduct of the bankrupt as a trader before as well as after his bankruptcy. What, then, is conduct as a trader? In Ex parte Spicer, (3 De G. & S. 601; 14 Jur., part 1, p. 30), Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, V. C., held that the misapplication of money by a scrivener, which had been received into his trust or custody, but not received by him in his capacity of scrivener, was not conduct as a trader. In the same case, which was originally heard before Mr. Commissioner Stephen, that learned gentleman said that "gambling and extravagant expenditure might be conduct as a trader, though not immediately committed in the capacity of trader, because they tend to diminish the funds to which the trade creditors are entitled to look for payment." In Ex parte Wakefield it was laid down by the same judge who decided Ex parte Spicer, that breaches of trust by a bankrupt, not being in the way of trade, although the money due from him as a trustee finds its way into his trade, and is used by him as a trader, are not conduct as a trader within the meaning of the act. These cases are merely exclusive, but by no means satisfactory, and we very much doubt whether the doctrine contained in them is not too broadly stated. On the other hand, in Ex parte Jardine, (1 Fonb. N. R. 182), Mr. Commissioner Holroyd, commenting upon the case of Ex parte Wakefield, tells us that the word "trader," as used in the bankrupt acts, is a generic term, denoting a class of persons made liable to become bankrupt, and to be subject to the bankrupt law; and to regard the conduct of the bankrupt as a trader requires regard to his conduct not merely in the course of the particular trade which he carried on, but as one of such class of persons subject to the statute relating to bankrupts, by which statute all his estate of every description, whether acquired in the course of his trade or otherwise, is divisible among his creditors. All debts proveable, he goes on to say, must be treated as debts contracted by the bankrupt as a trader within the meaning of the bankrupt law; and the Court is to regard the conduct of the bankrupt in any matter concerning which the Court is authorised to call for information and discovery, bearing in mind that the statute contains provisions expressly limiting the power of inquiry to such matters as relate to the person, trade, dealings, or estate of the bankrupt, or any act of bankruptcy committed by him. One effect of this definition is, that if any person liable to become bankrupt has at any time, and whether during or in the course of trade or not, contracted any debt which would be proveable under the bankruptcy, his conduct in respect of that debt must be regarded by the Court upon the question of the certificate. When his Honor used the word "debt" it must be observed that he was alluding to all debts or demands proveable under the bankruptcy, and not merely to debts for the recovery of which there is a remedy by action at law. With this opinion of the learned commissioner the Lords Justices seem latterly to have become more inclined to concur. In Ex parte Staner, (2 De G., Mac., & G. 263; 16 Jur., part 1, p. 1124), Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, L. J., said, "If a man happening to be in trade obtains money fraudulently, and not in the course of his business, that is conduct as a trader within the meaning of the act." And in the very recent case of Ex parte Leslie, (2 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 822), Sir G. J. Turner, L. J., almost ventured to take the further step, when he hinted, that after it had been decided that conduct as a trader was not restricted to conduct in trade, it would be difficult thenceforth to confine it to conduct during trade. It was not necessary, however, in that case to decide the point, because the bankrupt had obtained a loan of money on the representation that he was a trader, and their Lordships were of opinion that he could not afterwards be heard to say that he was not that which, for the purposes of gain, he had represented himself to be. It is to be noticed, that in sect. 256 the phrase "as a trader" is omitted, and it is only under the ninth head, where the words "during his trading" occur, that any restriction to the time of trading is introduced; and these words, as appears from the same case, cannot elsewhere be implied. (Per Sir G. J. Turner, L. J.)

Again: when, in the exercise of the discretion conferred either by the 198th or 256th sections, a bankrupt's certificate has been refused, or when in cases falling within the 256th section it has been suspended, the Lords Justices, with the consent of the assignees and opposing creditors, have not unfrequently granted to the bankrupt a protection from arrest. (See Ex parte Holthouse, 1 De G., Mas., & G. 237, and Ex parte Rufford, 2 De G., Mac., & G. 234). We do not quite understand upon what principle their Lordships have proceeded in so acting. By the 256th section it is enacted, that if at the sitting appointed for the last examination of any bankrupt, &c. it shall appear to the Court that he has committed any of the offences thereinafter enumerated, the Court shall refuse to grant him any further protection from arrest; and if at any sitting, &c. for the allowance of the certificate of any bankrupt, it shall appear that he has committed any of such offences, the Court shall refuse to grant such certificate, or shall suspend the same for such time as it shall think fit, and shall in like manner refuse to grant the bankrupt any further protection; the words "in like manner" manifestly referring to the first part of the section. In the 198th section, on the other hand, there is no allusion to protection at all; and therefore it may be presumed, that in cases not falling within sect. 256, the Legislature intended to leave to the Court the authority, which is given to it by sect. 112, to grant protection for such time as the Court shall from time to time think fit to appoint, until the certificate is allowed. From this it follows, that if the Court, acting upon the general discretion intrusted to it by sect. 198, and upon that alone, suspends a bankrupt's certificate, protection may be granted; but not, we imagine, when the certificate is refused, because the 112th section contemplates cases "where the allowance of the certificate is sub judice, or still waiting the determination of the Court, and it does not apply to cases where the power of the Court to allow the certificate has become inoperative, as where the allowance of the certificate has been wholly refused, and the time for an appeal is past, and no grounds can be shewn for a rehearing." (Per Mr. Commissioner Holroyd in Ex parte Gibson). Moreover, the language of the 256th section is so precise and positive, that we cannot help thinking, that whenever a bankrupt has subjected himself to the penalty imposed by that clause, the discretion is restrained to the refusal or suspension of the certificate, and he cannot any longer be protected from arrest.

An act to amend the Joint-stock Companies Act, 1856, is now on its passage through Parliament; and, as will be seen from the copy of the proposed bill, which has been printed by order of the House of Commons, it promises to supply some important omissions and to remedy some defects which have been already pointed out in these columns. At the same time there is ample room for improvement in the amendment act itself; and as the gentlemen by whom it has been introduced are, no doubt, anxious to render it as complete as possible, we venture to offer a few further suggestions which may contribute towards this desirable result.

Since the principal act was passed, one petition has already been presented to the Court of Bankruptcy, under sect. 69, for the winding up of a limited company; and upon this first occasion of testing the practical working of the act, so dangerous a flaw was discovered in the machinery, that it became doubtful whether it could be made to work at all. Fortunately the defect is one which can very easily be repaired, but it must be repaired with speed, or the proceedings of the Court may be at a stand-still. A very few words will be sufficient to explain the case. Upon the original hearing of the petition the first question which naturally occurred to the judge was—"Have I any and what jurisdiction in this matter?" and he proceeded to look into the act to see how this fact was to be ascertained. Now, by sect. 77 of the Joint-stock Companies Act, 1856, power is given to the Court, after it has made an order or decree for winding up a company, to summon before it any person whom the Court may deem capable of giving information concerning the trade, dealings, estate, or effects of the company, and to require any such person to produce books and documents, &c.; and any person so summoned refusing to attend is liable to be apprehended and brought compulsorily before the Court; and by sect. 78 the Court may examine upon oath, either by word of mouth or upon written interrogatories, any person appearing or brought before it in manner aforesaid, concerning the trade, dealings, estate, or effects of the company, and so forth. But, on the other hand, the judge was unable to find any provision similar to those in the Bankrupt-law Consolidation Act, 1849, sects. 100 and 260, or that in the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 45, s. 118, authorising the Court to compel the attendance of any witness, or to enforce the production of any evidence of any kind, before it makes an order for winding up. Under these circumstances, but for the voluntary attendance of witnesses at a subsequent hearing, and information obtained through a receiver, who had been appointed under sect. 84, it is very questionable whether the Court would have felt itself justified in making the order prayed. It is true that the petition for winding up a company must be supported by affidavit; but it is quite obvious that in many, indeed in most cases, particularly if the petition were opposed, a one-sided statement of this kind, emanating from persons whose veracity the judge would have no means of putting to the proof, might well be inadequate to satisfy his mind, and accordingly that no course might be left to him but to dismiss the petition. The evil thus brought to light, although escaped in the present instance, may at any time recur; and it is, therefore, to be hoped that an additional clause will be inserted in the amendment act (which is silent on this head) for the purpose of enabling the Court, before an order or decree has been made for winding up a company, to examine any witness, and to obtain any other evidence which it may think requisite to establish a proper case for the exercise of its powers. It might, perhaps, be argued that an authority to call for the necessary evidence is implied in the authority to make the order. But whenever a new statutory jurisdiction is conferred upon any Court, the law has ever been, that the Court shall regard the statute alone, and cannot act in a way which is not therein expressly sanctioned; nor can it, we think, for a moment be contended that the coerced attendance of witnesses is a mere matter of practice, so as to be brought with the 99th section of the principal act. Again: by the 89th section of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47, the official liquidators are to take into their custody all the property, effects, and things in action of the company; and by subsequent sections of the same statute, and also by sects. 16 and 17 of the proposed amendment act, they are enabled, for the purposes of winding up the company, to deal with its property almost in as ample a manner as if they were the absolute owners. But nevertheless neither by the one act nor the other is the property of the company vested in the official liquidators, and, notwithstanding the extent of their duties, they are in fact nothing more than mere receivers. We can hardly think it was intended that the character of receivership rather than of ownership should be impressed upon their office; but in any case we think it would be much more advisable to assimilate their position in this respect to that of the official manager under the old Winding-up Acts, or of the official assignee in matters of bankruptcy, and to vest in the official liquidators, or liquidator when only one is appointed, all the estate and effects of the company from the date of the appointment. We believe that many intricate subjects of controversy, particularly with respect to priorities of title and inchoate acts and agreements, may otherwise hereafter arise, which an enactment to this effect would altogether avoid. The 21st clause of the new bill was added to it while in committee, and like many extraneous additions similarly tacked on to other bills in the same stage of their progress, seems to have been too hastily and incautiously adopted. It enacts, that if at the expiration of twelve months from the date of the dissolution of any company that has been wound up, there remain in the hands of the liquidators any undistributed assets of the company, the liquidators shall be deemed to be trustees of these assets within the meaning of the Trustee Relief Act, 11 Vict. c. 96, and may pay or transfer them into the Court of Chancery accordingly. In cases of which the Court of Chancery has cognisance this may be a useful provision; but where the management of winding up the company is committed to the Court of Bankruptcy, it can serve no good end, and may occasion much useless expense. Besides the mischief invariably consequent upon a divided and conflicting jurisdiction, nothing surely can be more injudicious than that the Court, which has conducted all the proceedings up to the very last stage, and is familiar with all the details of the company's affairs, should of a sudden be superseded in its functions, and the control over the residue of the assets intrusted to another Court, which is an entire stranger to the rights of all the parties interested. It would be a much simpler and better plan to provide, that where a limited company is wound up upon petition, the liquidators should be deemed trustees of these assets, subject to the direction of the Court, or (which would be equally efficacious) to exclude such a case altogether from the 21st section, and then the surplus fund might be at once paid over to the accountant in bankruptcy, to be applied for the benefit of such persons and in such manner as the Court should order. The Court of Bankruptcy is quite as competent to deal with a surplus as the Court of Chancery; and it is just as unreasonable to foist the operation of the Trustee Relief Act upon the undistributed assets of a company which has been wound up under the superintendence of the former Court, as it would be to divert the residue of a bankrupt's or insolvent's estate from its original and legitimate channel of distribution. The last suggestion which at present occurs to us is only of importance so far as it will save a good deal of needless trouble, and some expense in drawing up the orders of the Court. Wherever the Legislature vests in any existing Court an entirely new, and not merely an enlarged jurisdiction, that Court is in exactly the same position as if it had been created by statute for that special purpose. Every order of the Court must state all the particular circumstances which may be necessary to shew that it has not exceeded the limits of the authority conferred upon it by the act. To obviate this inconvenience, the Bankrupt-law Consolidation Act, 1849, and other acts, contain a number of short forms of orders and certificates, adapted to all ordinary occasions. The Joint-stock Companies Act, 1856, however, contains none; and the amendment act of this year is at present equally barren. Still it may be thought expedient that the labour of preparing the requisite forms should devolve upon those persons who by the principal act are empowered to make rules for the regulation of the process of winding up companies in the respective courts. If so, all that would be required in the amendment act in this particular would be a short clause, calculated to embrace all the cases in which the Lord Chancellor and his assistants might omit, or think it unnecessary, to provide any general forms, and importing that in every order made by the Court in virtue of the act, it should be sufficient, in lieu of all other recitals, to state simply, that in the matter of the act, and of the particular company, certain parties had appeared on such and such a day, and were heard, and that it was then ordered as thereinafter set forth.

THE WILLS, &c. OF BRITISH SUBJECTS ABROAD.

Sir Fitzroy Kelly, Mr. Malins, and Lord Stanley have brought in a bill to "amend the law relating to the wills and to the granting of administration of the personal estate of British subjects resident or domiciled elsewhere than in England," of which we give the substance below.

If a test of the proficiency of candidates for the Bar is necessary or expedient, far more necessary and expedient is it that those who assume, not to administer, but to frame and amend the laws, should not be allowed to practise upon the country before they have submitted to an examination on at least the principles of jurisprudence and legislation, and the details of that branch of law with which they propose to meddle. We have heard of large fees being paid to the two learned gentlemen who have lent their names to this bill for their opinions on questions of law not very remote from the subject in hand, and have supposed their opinions to be entitled to some respect; but after reading this bill, it is difficult to resist the conclusion that either they have neglected the trust reposed by their constituents in them as lawyers, and have sanctioned a bill which they have never read or considered, or their legal studies have not been exhaustive. It is proposed to enact, by sect. 1, that "Every will, codicil, or other testamentary paper executed and attested according to the law of England for the time being by any British subject shall be valid and effectual, and admitted to probate, notwithstanding such subject shall at the time of his death, or at any other time, be or have been resident or domiciled elsewhere than in England, and shall operate in all respects as if such subject had died domiciled in England."

All lawyers know that all European nations agree in the rule, that the devolution and distribution of the moveable estate of a deceased person is regulated by the law of the place in which he died domiciled; the only doubt as to the extent of the rule being, whether it includes or does not include, wholly or in part, such interests in real or immoveable property as by the law of the place in which the property is situate are regarded as being of the nature of personal estate; and the main difficulty in the application of the rule being to decide in each particular case as to the fact of domicil—a doubt and a difficulty which, as might be expected from the framers of such a bill as this, are left wholly untouched. Leaving the doubt and the difficulty untouched, what is proposed to be done by this clause? But note, first, that it is not proposed to make the operation of the act, with reference to the property of any person dying abroad, conditional on the rule laid down by the act being adopted by the law of the country where he dies. Bearing in mind that this is not to be done by the act, our readers will be able to characterise what it is to do, after considering the following case:—Jones, a British subject, dies domiciled in Spain, being possessed of considerable personal property there, and entitled to goods and money in transitu from England, goods consigned to England for sale, stock in the British funds, debts due from creditors in England, bills of exchange drawn on and accepted by persons resident in Spain, but which bills he has deposited as a security with bankers in England, and goods and chattels and money situate in England. He leaves several children—some with a British, some with a Spanish, domicil; and he makes a will according to the English form, which is invalid by the law of Spain. Of course, so far as concerns the decision of the Spanish Courts, and the rights and liabilities of persons in Spain, the will is a nullity. But Sir F. Kelly and Mr. Malins have persuaded the British Legislature to say that "such will shall be valid and effectual, and operate in all respects as if such subject had died domiciled in England." The executors are bold enough to prove in England, and get in and administer all the property they can realise there. What are they to do with the Spanish bills? They go to Spain, and are there brought to account for misapplying the assets: must they appeal to the British consul and to Lord Palmerston?

It is scarcely worth while to notice, that though the clause suggests that a foreign domicil at the date of the will may invalidate it notwithstanding an English domicil at the death, it says that the will is to operate as if the testator had died domiciled in England.

2. "Administration of the goods of British subjects dying intestate shall be granted to the persons entitled to the same by the law of England for the time being, notwithstanding such subjects shall at the time of their deaths, or at any other time, be or have been resident or domiciled elsewhere than in England, in like manner as if such subjects had died domiciled in England."

3. "This act shall not apply to any will, codicil, or testamentary paper, or to the grant of administration of the goods, of any person who shall be dead at the time of the passing thereof."

4. "This act shall not apply to Scotland."

What does this mean? We know what it was intended to express; but does it not also express that the will of a British subject dying abroad, and rendered valid by the act, shall not be so rendered valid as to property locally situate in Scotland, and as to debtors and courts in Scotland?

The bill is framed in ignorance of the nature of the evils to be remedied. The evils are—first, that questions of domicil depend upon matters of evidence and fact, as well as of law, creating difficulties that probably cannot be removed by any legislation; and, secondly, that British subjects resident abroad are very apt to make their wills without regard to the law of their domicil. This difficulty is not to be met by creating greater difficulties—by making for them wills which no one can administer, and which, if administered, would have only a partial operation, dependent in its extent upon a thousand niceties of law and accidents of locality. The remedy, if a remedy can be found, is to be sought in establishing, by treaties with foreign states, and by legislation based on those treaties, the validity of wills of British subjects made in accordance with the English law.

BILL IN PROGRESS.

ABSTRACT OF A BILL

(As amended in Committee)

To amend the Joint-stock Companies Act, 1856.

Sect. 1. Short title of act.

2. Definition of principal act and Joint-stock Companies Acts.

3. Repeals the 4th section of the principal act, and enacts, that if more than twenty persons carry on in partnership any trade or business, having for its object the procurement of gain to the partnership, then, unless such persons—

(1). Are registered as a company under the principal act;
(2). Are a company incorporated or otherwise legally constituted by or in pursuance of some act of Parliament, royal charter, or letters-patent; or
(3). Are engaged in working mines within and subject to the jurisdiction of the Stannaries;

"each one of the persons so carrying on business in partnership together, contrary to this provision [sic], shall be severally liable for the payment of the whole debts of the partnership, and may be sued for the same without the joinder in the action or suit of any other member of the partnership."

4. The registrar shall, on payment of 5*s*., issue a certificate of incorporation of any company to any person applying for the same, and such certificate shall be admissible in evidence, in like manner as the certificate of incorporation directed to be given by the principal act.

5. Power of limited company to convert paid-up shares into stock.

7. Register of holders of stock.

8. Remedy for improper entry, or omission of entry, in register of stock.

9. Power of the court, under the 25th section of the principal act, to decide on disputed questions.

10. Penalty of 1*l*. on company for not forwarding copies of memorandum and articles of association to shareholders.

11. Where an order has been made for winding up a company under the third part of the principal act, if, upon the application of the official liquidator, it appears to the court having jurisdiction in the matter of such winding up that there is probable cause for believing that any contributory to such company is about to quit the United Kingdom, or otherwise abscond, or to remove or conceal any of his goods or chattels, for the purpose of evading payment of calls, or for avoiding examination in respect of the affairs of the company, the court may, by warrant directed to such person or persons as it thinks fit, cause such contributory to be arrested, and his books, papers, monies, securities for monies, goods and chattels, to be seized, and him and them to be safely kept until such time as the court may order.

12. Contributory arrested, or whose goods are seized, may apply to court for discharge.

13. Calls under third part of principal act to be specialty debts.

14. In cases within the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in England or Ireland, or of the Court of Session in Scotland, or of the Court of the Stannaries, the court having jurisdiction shall, in the appointment of an official liquidator or official liquidators, consult the interests of both the creditors and contributories, and hear such creditors or contributories as it thinks fit to hear with respect to such appointment. It may, unless both the creditors and contributories concur in the appointment of a single liquidator, appoint one or more liquidator or liquidators to act on behalf of each of such parties. It may declare, that in case of difference, any act may be done by a majority of liquidators, or it may require the liquidators, in all cases of difference, to apply to the court. It may do anything hereby authorised to be done, either upon the first appointment of a liquidator, or at any subsequent stage of the winding up; but notwithstanding anything herein contained, it shall not be obligatory on the court to appoint more than one liquidator, if, in its discretion, it thinks that such appointment will be most conducive to justice.

15. In cases within the jurisdiction of any Court of Bankruptcy the official assignee shall, where a liquidator is appointed by the creditors, be considered as appointed as the representative of the contributories, and, where a liquidator is appointed by the contributories, be considered as appointed as the representative of the creditors.

16. The power of compromising debts and claims given by the principal act to the liquidators therein mentioned shall be deemed to extend to the compromise of any calls or debts due from any contributory or alleged contributory to the company on receipt of a smaller sum in lieu of a greater, or upon such terms as may be agreed upon, with power to the liquidators to take any security for any calls or debts so due, and to give effectual discharges on completion of such compromise; subject to this proviso, that no such compromise shall be made by any official liquidator except with the sanction of the court, and after giving such notice to creditors, and subject to such conditions as to obtaining the consent of creditors, or any portion of them, as the court may direct, and that no such compromise shall be made by the liquidators appointed on the voluntary winding up of a company, except with the sanction of a special resolution.

17. Where a company is being wound up voluntarily, and the whole or a portion of its property is about to be sold to another company, registered under this act, the liquidators of the first-mentioned company may, with the sanction of a special resolution of the company by whom they were appointed, receive, in compensation or part compensation for such sale, shares in such other company, for the purpose of distribution amongst the shareholders of the company being wound up, or may enter into any other arrangement whereby the shareholders of the company being wound up may, in lieu of receiving cash or shares, or in addition thereto, participate in the profits of or receive any other benefit from the purchasing company; and any sale made or arrangement entered into by the liquidators in pursuance of this section shall be binding on the shareholders of the company being wound up; subject to this proviso, that if any shareholder in the company being wound up, who has not voted in favour of the special resolution passed by his company at either of the meetings held for passing the same, expresses his dissent from any such special resolution, in writing addressed to the liquidators or one of them, and left at the registered office of the company, not later than seven days after the date of the last of the meetings at which such special resolution was passed, such dissentient shareholder may require the liquidators to do such one of the following things as they may prefer; that is to say, either to abstain from carrying such resolution into effect, or to purchase the shares held by the dissentient shareholders or shareholder, at such price as may be agreed upon or settled by arbitration, such purchase money to be paid before the company is dissolved, and to be raised by the liquidators in such manner as may be determined by special resolution.

18. Power of liquidators to call general meeting.

19. Power of court to adopt proceedings of voluntary winding up.

20. Penalty on liquidators not reporting dissolution of company to registrar, 5*l*. per diem.

21. Liquidators having in their hands undistributed assets of the company may pay them into court under the "Act for better securing Trust Funds, and for the Relief of Trustees."

22. Repeals the 107th section of the principal act, and revives stats. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, and 10 & 11 Vict. c. 78, and the Limited Liability Act, 1855, as to any company completely registered which has not obtained registration under the principal act, until such time as such company obtains registration under the Joint-stock Companies Acts, 1856, 1857, but from and after such time, and not before, shall be repealed as to such last-mentioned company; and, subject as aforesaid, all the acts mentioned in this section shall be removed.

23. Companies completely registered under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, and registered under the principal act after the 3rd November, 1856, to be deemed effectually registered.

24. Repeal of sect. 110 of principal act.

25. Completely registered companies (except insurance companies) to register before the 2nd November, 1857.

26. Penalties on company not registering, viz.—

(1). The company shall be incapable of suing either at law or in equity, but shall not be incapable of being made a defendant to a suit either at law or in equity:

(3). Each director or manager of the company shall for each day during which the company is in default incur a penalty of 5*l*., and such penalty may be recovered by any person, and be applied by him to his own use.

27. Every company consisting of seven or more shareholders, having a capital of fixed amount, divided into shares, also of fixed amount, duly constituted by law prior to the passing of this act, and not being a company hereby required to be registered, may at any time hereafter, upon compliance with the provisions of the Joint-stock Companies Acts, 1856, 1857, register itself as a company under such acts, with or without limited liability; subject to this proviso, that no company shall be registered as a limited company unless either the liability of the shareholders is already limited to the amount of the unpaid calls on their shares, or an assent to its being so registered has been given by three-fourths in number and value of such of its shareholders as may have been present, personally, or by proxy, in cases where proxies are allowed by the regulations of the company, at some general meeting summoned for that purpose.

28. Power for existing company to register amount of stock instead of shares.

29. Provision as to list of shareholders required by sect. 111 of principal act.

30. Exemption of certain companies from payment of fees.

31. The 113th section of the principal act shall be repealed, and in lieu thereof be it enacted as follows:—Upon compliance with the requisitions of the Joint-stock Companies Acts, 1856, 1857, respecting registration, the registrar of joint-stock companies shall certify under his hand that the company applying for registration is incorporated as a company under the Joint-stock Companies Acts, 1856, 1857, and in the case of a limited company that it is limited, and thereupon such company shall be incorporated accordingly; and all provisions contained in any act of Parliament, deed of settlement, letters-patent, or other instrument constituting or regulating any company that has been registered under the provisions of the said 113th section, or any company that may hereafter be registered under this section, shall be deemed to be regulations of the company, in the same manner as if they were contained in a registered memorandum of association and articles of association; and all the provisions of the Joint-stock Companies Acts, 1856, 1857, shall apply to such company, in the same manner in all respects as if it had been originally incorporated under such acts, subject to the reservation in favour of creditors contained in the principal act, and to the following provisoes:—

(1). That Table B. shall not, unless adopted by special resolution, apply to any such company as is mentioned in this section:

(2). That no company shall have power to alter any provision contained in any act of Parliament relating to the company:

(3). That no company shall have power, without the sanction of the Board of Trade, to alter any provision contained in any letters-patent relating to the company:

(4). That nothing herein contained shall authorise any company to alter any such provisions contained in any deed of settlement, letters-patent, or other instrument constituting or regulating the company, as would, if such company had originally been incorporated under the Joint-stock Companies Acts, 1856, 1857, have been contained in the memorandum of association, and are not authorised to be altered by such last-mentioned acts:

But nothing herein contained shall derogate from any power of altering its constitution or regulations which may be vested in any existing company by virtue of any such act of Parliament, deed of settlement, letters-patent, or other instrument constituting or regulating the company: moreover the repeal of the said 113th section of the principal act shall not affect any right acquired under the section so repealed.

ORDER OF COURT.

WHEREAS it is proper that the accounts kept by the Accountant-General of this Court should be examined and compared, in order to settle the same; and whereas it will require considerable time to perfect such examination, and it is necessary that a time should be appointed for closing the books of accounts of the said Accountant-General for the purposes aforesaid, I do order that the books of the said Accountant-General be closed from and after Thursday, the 20th August next, to Wednesday, the 28th October next, inclusive, excepting upon the days and for the purposes hereinafter mentioned, in order to adjust the accounts of the suitors with the books kept at the Bank, and that during that time no draft for any money, except as hereinafter provided, or certificate for any effects under the care and direction of this Court, be signed or delivered out by the said Accountant-General, or any stocks or annuities accepted or transferred by him relating to the suitors of this Court; and that no purchase, sale, or transfer be made by the said Accountant-General, unless the order, request, or registrar's certificate be left at his office on or before Monday, the 10th August next; and that no order for payment of any money out of court which may be then in court be received at the Accountant-General's office after Wednesday, the 12th August next. Provided, nevertheless, that the office of the said Accountant-General shall be opened on Wednesday, the 14th, Thursday, the 15th, and Friday, the 16th October next, for the delivery out of any regular interest drafts which have become payable in respect of the October dividends, and of any other regular interest drafts which shall have become payable during the closing of the office as aforesaid. And to the end that the suitors may have notice hereof, and apply to the Court as there shall be occasion to have money paid to them out of the Bank or stocks, or annuities transferred to them, before the said 20th August next, I do order that this Order be entered and affixed up in the several offices of this court.

CRANWORTH, Chancellor.
